Jews in Paris celebrate a bar mitzvah in a synagogue that, like most synagogues in Europe, is heavily guarded.

Jewish life in Europe is no joke

Emanuele Ottolenghi
The Times of Israel

Last Sunday, 27 countries across Europe celebrated the annual European Day of Jewish Culture 2012.

What began in 1996 near Strasbourg, France, as a local effort to open abandoned and decaying synagogues to the public, with the ultimate goal of raising enough funds to restore them, has today developed into a continent-wide, one-day cultural event focused on a theme, and its aim is to celebrate Jewish culture across Europe.

No doubt every EU country contributed money and effort, along with local Jewish communities and institutions, to highlight their support for continuous Jewish revival as a sign that despite history, in today's Europe, Jews are truly at home.

Antisemitism, on and off, has been a growing and disconcerting phenomenon in Europe during the last decade and a half, and there's no better evidence of its marginal nature than the impressive display of public participation in Sunday's activities, which Sunday's speakers noted. To be fair, the European Day of Jewish Culture is but one of many publicly funded or sponsored cultural activities that showcase Jewish culture, life and history in Europe. Museums, film festivals, book weeks, cultural exhibits, public funds for synagogue restoration, Holocaust education, property restitution, school visits to Auschwitz are a few of the thousands of events, and recurrences that engage Europe in its steady course toward reclaiming its Jewish past proudly as its own.

Yet we should not mistake an enthusiastic embrace of dead Jews and their artifacts, or of living Jews and their active participation in western culture, as a sign that Jews are fully welcome. At least, not on their own terms.

Consider this year's theme for Sunday's celebrations - Jewish humour. Jokes were in abundance, as if to suggest that self-irony is what makes Jews what they are.

Jewish humour is very distinctive and very real - and there is something both redeeming and philosophically intriguing in the phenomenon of a people making fun of itself for the better part of a history that was not always that funny.

Boaz Manor Banned

TORONTO — Boaz Manor, co-founder of the now-defunct Toronto hedge fund Portus Alternative Asset Management, has been permanently banned from the securities industry for his role in the collapse of the investment firm. The Ontario Securities Commission also ordered Manor to pay $8.8 million to receiver KPMG — investor funds that Manor used to buy diamonds through companies in Hong Kong in 2005 after his company imploded. According to documents filed with the Ontario Securities Commission last week, his sister-in-law picked up the diamonds and they have gone missing. Manor is currently on day parole from a four-year jail sentence imposed last year in connection with the Portus collapse.

Baird Speaks Out

OTTAWA — Foreign Affairs Minister John Baird urged UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon to stay away from a summit of non-aligned nations that took place in Iran last week. Baird said Tehran would use Ban's presence at the meeting of more than 100 countries for its own propaganda.

MPS Mobile Award

WINNIPEG — Adeena Karasick, a native of Winnipeg and a professor of global literature at St. John's University, has been named the winner of the MPS Mobile Award as being the world's first "Mobile Poet." As such, her work is being made available on mobile devices (cellphones and smartphones) throughout the world. Karasick is a poet and the critically acclaimed author of seven books of poetry and poetic theory.

Rabbi Gives Invocation at Convention

TAMPA — Rabbi Meir Soloveichik delivered the invocation at the opening of the U.S. Republican National Convention last Tuesday.

Rabbi Soloveichik opened his prayer by quoting the biblical verse on the Liberty Bell: "Proclaim Liberty throughout all the Land unto all the inhabitants thereof." According to Rabbi Soloveichik, this verse "embodies American independence... which unites faith and freedom, in asserting that our liberties are your gift, God, not that of government."

Rabbi Soloveichik, 35, is an associate rabbi at Congregation Kehilath Jeshurun in Manhattan's Upper East Side and director of the Straus Center for Torah and Western Thought at Yeshiva University. He hails from one of America's most prominent Jewish families.

The choice of Rabbi Soloveichik for the opening invocation is indicative of the larger trend of Orthodox Jews gravitating toward conservative politics. Though Orthodox Jews represent only a small (yet rapidly growing) segment of America's Jewish population, many are attracted to the GOP's social conservatism and policies on Israel.

Antisemitic Attacks

PARIS — French Jews have seen an increase of 40 per cent in antisemitic attacks since March, when Islamist terrorist Mohammed Merah killed three children and a rabbi at a Jewish school in Toulouse, Reuters reported.

Dr. Joe retires after 60-year career

Cynthia Gasner
Special to The CJN

After a 60-year medical career, Dr. Joseph Greenberg, affectionately called Dr. Joe by thousands of his patients and friends, has retired.

The compassionate 90-year-old general practitioner is one of a disappearing breed of physicians. He began his day at 5 a.m., cleared his desk, took his bag, and crisscrossed the city even in inclement weather, making house calls to patients who were unable to come to him because of age or disability.

He also went on hospital rounds and went back to his Toronto office at Bathurst and Ulster streets to see patients, often into the night.

He was both a healer and a mentor who had the respect of his patients as well as his colleagues.

He has cared for three generations and delivered more than 3,000 babies. At the family cottage in Belle Ewart, Ont., the lineups for allergy shots and medical advice are legendary.

Among his many awards and tributes, Greenberg was honoured by Boys Town Jerusalem, where the Dr. Joseph Greenberg Centre for Health services was established in recognition of his outstanding contributions.

At the tribute dinner, he said, "I feel privileged to look after people. That is my sole reward. It is deceitful that they are paying me twice for something that I've already gained my reward."

Throughout his medical career, he clung to the philosophy that every person deserves equal respect and attention, regardless of education or financial position.

During an interview with The CJN, he gave an example of what was most meaningful to him in his career.

"I went to visit an elderly woman who was hobbling with a cane as a result of major surgery. She said to me, 'The fact that you come to visit me, you do me an honour, and this makes me know that I am still worthwhile,'" he said.

When someone in your family passes away, you want everything to be done right, according to Jewish tradition. When my mother died, I didn't know half of what these things were. Benjamin's spent time with our family, explaining the significance of every sacred ritual. More than that, they made it ours. It was a beautiful way to honour my dear mother's life.

University and college classes have resumed.

On campuses across North America our children will make new friends, explore new pathways and likely test the ideas and values that formed their cocoon of comfort and security in our homes.

And of course, many of them will encounter for the first time and some will confront an entirely new cadre of social activists - aggressive, confrontational - for whom the most important cause in this vast planet of urgent and pressing causes is "liberating the Palestinians from their Israeli chains."

Most of our children will withstand these first anti-Israel encounters, disgusted by both the anti-democratic methods and the mistruths that the activists pass off ignorantly and/or fraudulently as ideals.

But some may not.

Some may get caught up in the self-asserting excitement of standing up for what appears to them to be right and true.

British educator, lecturer Rabbi Yehudah Rubinstein wrote about this phenomenon in a recent edition of The Jerusalem Report. His observations were disquieting. Although based entirely upon experiences dealing with young Jews in Europe and the United States, they merit sharing.

"I have discovered that identification with Israel often depends on the age of your audience. The older they are, the more likely they are to still be on Israel's side." (My emphasis)

There is hardly anything new in this general proposition. But with the inclusion of the tiny modifier "still", Rabbi Rubinstein adeptly steers us to the main point he intends to make.

Problem and answer

And he becomes quite specific.

"It would seem that the age of Zionism in the United States is roughly 40 years and up. Those below that age - especially teenagers and students - are less likely to side with Israel and more and more likely to become its critics and opponents."

"Generation after generation of Europeans have been fed on a steady diet of Israel demonization since the '70s. Many of those graduated and went on to become the journalists, editors, politicians and opinion makers of society. The result: Israel lost Europe."

"The same thing is happening in exactly the same way now all over America."

The situation Rabbi Rubinstein depicts in the United States is probably not the same in Canada. For many reasons, some of which relate to the impact of the diverse, still well attended system of Jewish education in Canada, Israel has not lost Canada.

But Rabbi Rubinstein's real blow to the stomach is what he writes next.

"When I first started working on campus in the UK all those years ago, I saw my job as defending Jews and the State of Israel to the non-Jewish world. The anti-Israelism hiding anti-Jewishness was all too obvious. By the time I left Britain in 2011, I found myself primarily defending Jews and the State of Israel to the Jewish world." (My emphasis)

"Over the last few years, I have told members of AIPAC and many other communal leaders that if American Jews do not wake up very soon and learn the lessons of fights lost on the front lines of European universities and colleges, there will be no battle left here to win. We will have lost the war."

Rabbi Rubinstein is not an alarmist. He is, though, sounding a serious alarm.

Thankfully, key policy makers and thinkers within the Jewish world share Rabbi Rubinstein's concern.

The Jerusalem-based Jewish People's Policy Institute (JPPPI), (See From the Editor's Desk, Aug. 23) has responded quite directly to Rabbi Rubinstein's cri de coeur.

In its recently published 2011 - 2012 Annual Assessment (of the state of the Jewish people), the JPPPI deals head-on with this very subject. In one of the central essays of the assessment entitled Creating Jewish Meaning in the United States and Europe: Emerging Adults, Cultural Creativity, and the Jewish Future in the U.S. and Europe, the institute analyses the scope of the problem and offers a wide, multi-faceted, integrated set of sweeping, out-of-the-box, original recommendations to begin to deal with it.

"If Israel and the Jewish world are so interdependent, Israel should make every effort to become more attractive as a focal point; and if reciprocity is important, we need to find ways for the Diaspora to have more of an impact on Israel's policies that may affect world Jewry. This is not a new problem, but it bears a fresh look."

The JPPPI provides that fresh look.

The essay is must reading for everyone concerned for the Jewish future - community planners, lay and professional leaders, philanthropists, rabbis, congregants, educators, parents, husbands, wives, grandparents, nieces, nephews, neighbours and friends. Everyone.

BAYCREST'S ARTISTS

Baycrest's Helen Kravetz admires the art she helped to create with artist-in-residence Jeff Nachtigall at Baycrest. Kravetz and a group of other residents at Baycrest's Apotex Centre, Jewish Home for the Aged, created the art panels over the summer with the help of university students who are pursuing careers in health care. The project taught the students the importance of using art as a vehicle for developing well-rounded clinical and interpersonal skills in geriatrics. The summer project was organized through Baycrest's new Centre for Learning, Research and Innovation.

Searching for a donor

Toronto man needs new liver to survive

Cara Stern
Special to The CJN

Sam Marr is on the hunt for a hero. For 27 years, he has been fighting a serious liver condition, and the time has come to find a living person willing to donate a portion of their liver.

The 50-year-old Toronto lawyer said he was diagnosed with primary sclerosing cholangitis when he was a 23-year-old law student. The disease comes with a gloomy prognosis. Although it is treatable, most people who contract PSC will ultimately either need a liver transplant or the disease will result in death. Throughout the years, Marr said he knew that one day, he would probably need a transplant – it was just a matter of time.

Every few months he was required to get blood work done, monitoring the progress of the disease. Recently, the doctors discovered he had a dangerously high MELD score – a scale that measures the severity of chronic liver disease, and is used to determine who gets priority for transplants. If his score continues to climb, and it reaches a score of 20, there is a 20 per cent chance he will die within three months, according to his wife, Susan Marr.

In February, Marr said he told his wife and 18- and 16-year-old sons, Darren and Adam, that he finally decided to put his name down on a waiting list for a deceased person's liver.

"It was probably one of the most difficult moments we had ever experienced as a family," said Susan Marr with a pause as she searched for the words to describe the memory. "The kids were devastated to hear the news."

Although Marr's name has been on the waiting list for months, his circumstances have placed him far down the list. The waiting list prioritizes by need, and as of now, his liver isn't deteriorating as quickly as some people with other diseases that worsen at a much faster pace, he explained.

"I'm coming to work and working a 40-

to 50-hour week," he said. "I have some issues, sometimes I'm tired and so on, but I'm still functioning."

However, his situation could change quickly. He described it as jumping out of an airplane without a parachute.

"When you're halfway done, someone asks if I'm OK and I'd say I'm fine... until I hit the ground," he said. "Right now, I'm probably not sick enough, but I'm going to get that sick and when I do, there might be not enough time."

That's why he's hoping for a live-donor liver transplant. If he can find one soon, he could complete the transplant while his body can still accept it and possibly fully recover.

According to the British Columbia Transplant Society, a living-person liver transplant involves moving a portion of the donor's liver into the patient. The surgery can take up to 10 hours, and usually keeps the donor in the hospital for seven to 10 days.

Unlike most other organs, a living donor's liver will grow back, repairing any damage from the surgery. It typically only takes a few months for the recipient to completely return to his or her normal life, according to the transplant society.

As Marr has type A blood, a potential match must have either blood type A or O. Either positive or negative would be acceptable. That's the first hurdle, Marr said, and once a person passes that requirement, the chance of them being a match is one in six. The match should be somewhat anatomically similar, he explained, though this does not have to be exact.

"As I understand it, you couldn't put a 6-foot-10 basketball player's liver into a small ballerina," he said, "but it's not that narrow, either. You have to be broadly matched."

Unlike some other transplants, there is no benefit to being a relative, he said. Anybody with the right blood type could be a match.

A prospective donor would visit Toronto General Hospital and undergo evaluation to confirm eligibility. Marr said this hospital is highly scrupulous in their assessment.

"They're justifiably proud that they've done hundreds of these and no live donor has ever died [from the procedure]," he said.

Although the odds of finding a match is greater than some other transplants, Marr has been unsuccessful so far. Several friends and family members have been evaluated, but so far none have been deemed a match.

Susan Marr said living with the disease in her family has made for a very difficult journey, but she's hoping someone will be able to save her husband's life.

"Living with someone who you love and adore, and watching them struggle with such a horrific illness is very difficult on the entire family," she said, "but we remain hopeful and optimistic. We're hoping the world will listen to our plea and come forward and want to help our family."

For information about becoming a living donor, contact the Living Donor Transplant Office at Toronto General Hospital at 416-340-4800, ext. 6581, or email liverdonorsam@gmail.com

Remember the joy of Jewish Summer Camp?

Camp Northland, ca. 1965 Ontario Jewish Archives

At camp, you learned how to swim and canoe, to make new friends, and not burn yourself while roasting marshmallows on an open fire. But you also learned about your history, Israel and the Jewish people.

The future of our Jewish community depends on programs that nurture and strengthen Jewish identity in our youth. That's why UJA Federation of Greater Toronto invests in Jewish education serving more than 70 day schools and supplementary schools, as well as identity programs like Jewish summer camp, Birthright Israel, March of the Living and Hillel, to name just a few. Through UJA, together we are making sure that the next generation is infused with a strong Jewish identity so that they feel proud, confident and secure as they go forward into the world.

On behalf of all the future leaders of our community we say thank you for your gift to United Jewish Appeal.

Carter's contempt

Former U.S. president Jimmy Carter inveighed last week against the Israeli justice system. His latest polemic against the Jewish state was of a piece with his reputation as a champion of perversely inverted human rights.

Haifa District Court Judge Oded Gershon ruled last week that the death of 23-year American Rachel Corrie in March 2003 "was a regrettable accident." He thus dismissed her family's civil lawsuit against the Israel Defence Forces.

Carter, on the other hand, having attended none of the court sessions, having heard none of the testimony given under oath, decided in his comfortable office in Atlanta many thousands of kilometres away from Haifa – and indeed from the war zone that the Philadelphia Corridor of Gaza was in March 2003 where Corrie pled her misguided notions – that the Israeli court's decision was "unacceptable."

"The killing of an American peace activist is unacceptable. The court's decision confirms a climate of impunity, which facilitates Israeli human rights violations against Palestinian civilians in the Occupied Territory," Carter said in a statement from the Carter Center.

In her mind, Corrie was a peace activist. In the minds, however, of the leaders of International Solidarity Movement (ISM), the radical, pro-Palestinian group who recruited her and encouraged her to travel to Gaza, she was a foot soldier in their struggle for Palestine's "liberation."

At the time of her death, Corrie was trying to deter an IDF bulldozer from advancing. She was acting as a human shield in what was an internationally acknowledged war zone where live fire had been exchanged almost daily. Palestinian terrorists had been shooting for years at Israelis from the very area that Corrie was trying to protect. The Israeli army was clearing away the terrorists' cover.

At the time, ISM founder Thom Scafford responded to Corrie's death by telling the Washington Post "It's possible they [the activists] were not as disciplined as we would have liked. But we're like a peace army. Generals send young men and women off to operations and some die." How empathetic.

Relying on the testimony of the Corrie family's own expert witness, the court decided that the driver of the bulldozer did not see Corrie when she fell from atop the mound of the earth the bulldozer driver was trying to move.

In the circumstances of the incident in 2003 and in light of the findings of fact by the Israeli court, Carter's comments are repugnant and entirely contemptible. His broadside against the judge's decision is unfair, unwarranted and unacceptable. It is simply another of his many vain, cheap attacks against Israel.

The ISM mercilessly exploited Corrie in life just as it has cynically exploited her death.

By accusing Israel, rather than the heartless individuals who sent Corrie into a very dangerous area, Carter simply abets the hard-hearted, anti-Israel zealots who were truly responsible for the young woman's death.

Boycott products from Arab countries

There have been hostilities against Christians and Muslims in Arab countries, but the United Church of Canada has never declared any boycotts because of such crimes ("Community 'outraged' at United Church," Aug. 23). Possibly, the intention of the church's decision to boycott products from Israeli settlement is to harm Israeli exports and to punish Israeli Jews because of the Israeli settlements that are built on a few square miles in the West Bank.

The United Church has always ignored the occupation of Kurdistan's territories by Iraq, Syria, Iran and Turkey. The Kurds are a nation of Sunni Muslims of Indo-European origin. Many Kurds have been killed during long-running rebellions and fierce fights for Kurdish independence. In 1988, in Halabja, the Iraqis killed thousands of Kurds by using mustard gas. The question is: when will the United Church declare a boycott of products made in Iran, Syria, Iraq and Turkey, the occupiers of Kurdistan territories?

Buy boycotted products

Let's divest ourselves of the opinions of the United Church of Canada and all other biased detractors who seek the downfall of the State of Israel ("Community 'outraged' at United Church," Aug. 23). Give us the ability to do so by providing us with a list of the products and suppliers of the products they would like boycotted so that the supporters of Israel can go out and buy those products. What's needed here is action, not useless chatter, to combat this attack. That would be a far more powerful response!

Church's stance not antisemitism

Like all churches, the United Church feels an obligation to speak out on behalf of the weaker party, whom many neutral observers see as the Palestinians ("Community 'outraged' at United Church," Aug. 23). I would agree that the church's timing around any kind of boycott talk, however constrained, is regrettable at a time when the Israeli postal service is distributing gas masks out of fear of Iranian aggression or retaliation. However, to conflate the church's stance with antisemitism is highly irresponsible and self-defeating. The partnership between Christians and Jews that has thrived in North America ever since there were organizations set up to strengthen those ties have led to untold prosperity, not just in business, but in the arts and sciences. Now common phrases such as Judeo-Christian would have been unthinkable 100 years ago, except in academic religious circles. Calls to boycott affiliates of the United Church or any other mainstream Christian church are as short-sighted as they are futile. North American Jews ought to view the U.S. and Canada as the goldeneh medinahs not to be disparaged in our loyalty to Medinat Yisrael.

Organizations don't speak for community

Various Canadian Jewish organizations' reactions to United Church General Council's passing a series of resolutions at its recent meeting are appalling, including your Aug. 23 editorial, "Morally irrelevant" ("Community 'outraged' at United Church," Aug. 23). Who elected the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) CEO Shimon Fogel and CIJA chair David Koschitzky as our representatives – those who smoothed the grassroots-based Canadian Jewish Congress? CIJA does not speak for the Jewish community of Canada, nor do Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies or B'nai Brith Canada.

Misleading headline

The CJN headline "Nearly half of Israelis oppose Iran strike" (Aug. 16) is highly misleading as it implies that more than half of Israelis support such a strike. Reading the story, however, one discovers that 46 per cent oppose a strike, 32 per cent support it and 22 per cent had no opinion. Leaving aside those with no opinion, about 60 per cent of Israelis, a very solid majority, oppose a strike and about 40 per cent would be in favour. Pollsters routinely correct for undecideds and, any way you look at it, the majority of Israelis, according to this poll, would be opposed to a unilateral strike against Iran.

Italians and Jews: an enduring bond

Objectively speaking, my having been born in Italy was a geographical accident.

Unlike the majority of their relatives, my dispossessed Hungarian Jewish parents had managed to avoid being murdered by the Nazis and their accomplices.

The United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration had shepherded them to Displaced Persons Camp No. 17 in Grugliasco, a town near the northern industrial city of Torino, together with many other refugees from all over Europe. Quite astonished and profoundly grateful that they were still among the living, my parents had modest aspirations. All they wanted was the opportunity to start reassembling their shattered lives, in any country in the world that would have them. Sadly, no invitations arrived.

For nearly three years, my parents languished in the Grugliasco camp, where they no longer subsisted in mortal fear and where their basic material needs were provided for. This was admittedly a dramatic improvement over the very different camps they had inhabited previously. But after all they had endured, they bridled at the daily indignity of being unable to return to the free, normal life of people everywhere.

At long last, in the fall of 1948, an unexpected opportunity arose for my parents to start life anew in a remote and unfamiliar land called Canada. They were absolutely thrilled and had no regrets whatsoever about leaving Italy behind. They carried with them a five-month-old bambino as the sole tangible keepsake of their melancholy Italian sojourn.

Since my parents were stateless refugees, I inherited their status, despite my birthplace. Italy was economically devastated after the war, and hardly in a position to offer permanent shelter to all the ragged strangers abruptly dumped within its borders. I was granted Canadian citizenship together with my parents five years after arriving in this capacious land of immigrants, and finally I belonged somewhere.

Today, as I ponder my family's tortuous odyssey from Hungary to Canada by way of Italy, I recognize that my having been born in Italy, geographical accident though it was, has exerted a profound influence on me.

I grew up in Toronto nourished by my mother's shimmering stories of the small, everyday acts of kindness bestowed by ordinary Italians on the hapless Jewish refugees in their midst. She has always been utterly convinced that such demonstrations of human decency helped survivors like her regain their faith in humanity and start rebuilding their devastated lives. Here is a characteristic example.

Shortly after I was born, my mother took me to a pediatrician in Torino for my first checkup. Finding herself hopelessly lost in the unfamiliar streets, she showed the slip containing the doctor's address to a passing stranger and asked if he could kindly point her in the right direction. Without hesitation, the gentleman took her by the arm, accompanied her on a 10-minute tram ride and then walked with her for several blocks, finally depositing mother and child safely at the entrance to the medical clinic.

Robert Eli Rubinstein

Such stories, of which there are many in my mother's repertoire, led me in my youth to regard the Italian people as paragons of virtue who played a special role in the rehabilitation of traumatized Jewish refugees like my parents after the war. As I grew to adulthood, of course, I came to realize that the truth is far more complex, that every national grouping encompasses a turbid mix of good, bad and indifferent individuals.

How people behave in extreme situations depends very largely on their objective circumstances. Members of a powerful majority group, for instance, have far greater opportunity to behave badly toward their fellows than members of a weak minority group. There were many heroic Italians who risked their lives in order to save Jewish friends and neighbours from the Germans. But sad to say, there were also Italians who enthusiastically supported the fascist alliance with Germany and were complicit in drafting and enforcing anti-Jewish legislation.

On journeys of discovery back to my birthplace over the years, I have been perturbed to learn that Italians are afflicted by a collective amnesia concerning the Jewish refugee camps in their country after the war. This fact suggests a great many guilty consciences regarding the Italian role in precipitating the need for such camps; but in fairness, it also suggests a refined moral sensibility that is sorely lacking in certain other nations with far more reason than the Italians to feel guilty.

Several years after arriving in Toronto, the men in my family decided to become house builders, recognizing the great opportunity presented by the ever-growing demand for housing in a booming metropolis. They were undeterred by their lack of qualifications or resources. Just then, large numbers of Italian immigrants, mainly from the ravaged-by-unemployment south, started pouring into Toronto, and many of them entered the undermanned construction trades. From a personal perspective, I see it as a wondrous irony that Jewish and Italian immigrants have worked together harmoniously to build habitats for the burgeoning population of their new homeland. The extraordinary saga of Italian-Jewish collaboration in the Toronto real estate industry awaits a proper telling.

People often talk about the remarkable affinities between Italians and Jews. They point to the emphasis placed by both groups on the importance of the traditional family, which is often guided by an authoritative mother figure. They direct our attention to frequently striking resemblances in physical appearance, to a common love of food and a fondness for talking about it. We are told that members of both groups tend to have strong personalities and to be highly opinionated; that impoverished, unschooled immigrants, both Jewish and Italian, were prepared to work very hard to create a better life, cherishing education as the key to upward mobility for their Canadian-born children. Of course, these are all stereotypes, and it is easy to cite exceptions without end in either group. Yet there is widespread recognition of the broad validity of the characterizations. Should we ascribe all the apparent similarities between Italians and Jews to mere coincidence, or is there perhaps something more to it?

The historical record indicates that in ancient times, in addition to Rome itself, Italy they eventually came to constitute the great majority of Jews in the world.

Meanwhile, under Spanish rule in the 16th century, the Inquisition pressured almost all the Jews still remaining in southern Italy to convert to Roman Catholicism.

The conclusion is clear: the bonds of ancestry between Italians and Jews run deep, so it should not be surprising that the two groups have so many characteristics in common.

Until recently, the historical record was our sole source of information regarding these bonds, albeit a compelling one. However, the new forensic tool of DNA testing has provided vivid scientific confirmation that Ashkenazi Jews bear a stronger genetic relationship, denoting commonality of ancestry, to southern Italians than to any other non-Jewish group in Europe. As a consequence of this dramatic revelation, growing numbers of people in southern Italy have begun to recognize, investigate and occasionally embrace their Jewish roots.

I find it particularly fascinating that the predominantly Ashkenazi Jews of Toronto,

The famous Arch of Titus in Rome in which the captivity of the Jews of Judea is depicted there were significant Jewish communities in southern Italy, especially in Sicily and Calabria. After the destruction of the Second Temple by the Romans in the year 70 CE, considerable numbers of captive Jews were brought back by the victors, greatly boosting the Jewish presence in Italy. With the later ascendancy of the Roman Catholic Church, most of the Jews in Italy were converted to Christianity.

Over time, there was a gradual northward migration of those who remained faithful to Judaism, and they began reaching the then-welcoming Rhine Valley in the 10th century. These were the first Ashkenazim who adopted the local Germanic language that gradually evolved into Yiddish. In the course of the following centuries, large numbers of Ashkenazi Jews fleeing persecution and denial of opportunity migrated en masse to eastern Europe, notably to Poland and Russia, where through prodigious fertil-including my own family, have roots in southern Italy – just like most of the Italians who have made their lives in Toronto. In a convoluted way, it turns out that I am "Italian" after all, together with a great many of my fellow Jews who have never realized it.

That Jews and Italians have come together through the vagaries of history, living in affectionate concord as friends, neighbours and colleagues in once unimaginably alien Toronto is truly a wonder to behold and a phenomenon most worthy of celebration.

He will be speaking on Sept. 19 at the Columbus Centre, as part of "Saluti a Jerusalem," presented by the Jerusalem Foundation of Canada and Villa Charities to celebrate the enduring friendship of Toronto's Italian and Jewish communities.*

An Olympic afterthought from Israel

I love the Olympics and always have, and this summer was no exception. Everyone I know knew not to bother me from July 27 to Aug. 12, and during those days I spent many hours bonding, mostly with my new HD TV, but also with my 12-year-old son, Natan, my partner in crime.

Natan and I planned our daily schedules around the events we wanted to see. Like many Israelis, we learned anything we could about all 37 Israeli athletes preparing to compete in the Games, particularly our medal hopefuls in judo, sailing and gymnastics, and sat captivated anytime an Israeli appeared.

We also enjoyed the exhilaration of other competitions and the performance of exceptional competitors. The Michael Phelps and Usain Bolts – to name but the obvious – but also other outstanding athletes in areas of sport we truthfully watch only once every four years.

In total, Israel has won seven medals in all the Olympics it has participated: one gold, a silver and five bronze. Yael Arad, a judoka, won Israel's first at the Barcelona Games in 1992, and we have won at least one medal at each successive Olympiad, the pinnacle coming in Athens in 2004 when Gal Fridman took gold in men's windsurfing.

When that run came to an end this summer in London, the disappointment was genuine, especially as we had several realistic hopefuls who'd recently proven themselves at world or regional championships.

With our best results only two sixth-place finishes – one in men's gymnastics, the other in women's windsurfing – the frustration soon turned into finger-pointing over budget mishandling, unqualified apparatus running various sports' local governing bodies, not to mention the Israeli Olympic Committee, lack of discipline and proper training and more.

One of Israel's biggest disappointments was Arik Ze'evi's loss in judo. Ze'evi, who won bronze in 2004, was the elder statesman of our entire Olympic team and was confident he'd complete his career with another medal at the London Games, his last. When he lost after 43 seconds in his first preliminary match, the entire country was devastated.

Our disappointing results brought back memories for me of the summer of 1976. I was a high-school student still living in Toronto, and Montreal was hosting the Olympics. During the spring, I had stood in a never-ending line to buy tickets to several events, and in the run-up to the Games, I purchased a series of commemorative stamps issued by Canada Post in a special booklet, which I recently rediscovered in a box of knick-knacks I brought with me to Israel when I made aliyah.

Three English cousins joined us from London, and my parents took all of us to Montreal for a couple of exciting days at the uncompleted but still remarkable Olympic Stadium. The atmosphere in the big "O" was genuinely electrifying, and just four years after the Munich massacre, I still remember the thrill of watching Esther Roth, a superb hurdler and the first Israeli athlete to ever reach an Olympic final, finishing sixth in the 100-metre hurdles.

On the day before the closing ceremony, the athletics competition included the men's high jump. Greg Joy, a Canadian high jumper, was in the running for the gold medal, and I recall the tension as all Canadians expectantly awaited their native son to finally deliver gold, only to be terribly disappointed when Joy had to settle for a second-place silver.

I also recall the competition my cousins and I had to determine which of our countries, Canada or Great Britain, was doing better at the Games. As they progressed, it became clear my cousins would prevail. It also became embarrassingly apparent Canada would be the first Olympic host country not to win a single gold medal.

So what do I take away from all of this? More than anything, that today I have no doubts about where my own patriotism lies – in a small Jewish country whose grandfatherly president, Shimon Peres, called a sobbing Ze'evi, dejectedly sitting in his locker room after his 43-second loss, to tell him how proud he was of his accomplishments and to keep his spirit high.

In a summer when all we heard were reports about if, when, where and how we'll attack Iran, London was a wonderful respite. I'm already counting down the days till Rio!

The United Church, Israel-bashing and Token Jews

The political war against Israel has intensified recently, led by activists in the United Church of Canada, the Presbyterian Church USA and the United Methodists. Each group produced pseudo-reports, held intense debates and then voted to adopt a form of BDS (boycotts, divestment and sanctions) targeting Israel using allegations of human rights violations, war crimes, and other justifications. In Britain, the Anglican Synod voted to give standing to a radical anti-Israel group known as the Ecumenical Accompaniment Program for Palestine and Israel (EAPPI), a World Council of Churches project that promotes BDS and other forms of demonization.

As part of the global and well-financed war, launched at the infamous NGO Forum of the 2001 UN anti-racism conference in Durban, South Africa, these church-based initiatives erase decades of Arab rejectionism, warfare and terror. They distort the conflict's history beyond recognition, portray Palestinians as innocent victims, and are key players in the 64-year old campaign to end the right of the Jewish people to sovereign equality in the State of Israel.

The obsessive focus on Israel highlighted moral double standards of these groups. The Presbyterians debated 12 foreign affairs resolutions, all on Israel. They were silent on the deaths of thousands in Syria, the persecution of Christians in Hamas-controlled Gaza and deadly attacks against Christian Copts in Egypt.

In all these cases, the leaders defended compulsive Israel-bashing by highlighting token support from a few fringe Jews. The Presbyterians boasted of "young Jewish activists" who provided "testimony" calling for isolating Israel. A journalist reported, "These activists were mostly affiliated with Jewish Voice for Peace [JVP]... Commissioners said their personal testimony helped undercut prevailing rhetoric on the mainstream Jewish perspective."

The Canadian version of the JVP provided cover in the United Church, and in the United Kingdom, an official of the Anglican Synod, speaking on the BBC, dismissed the Board of Deputies of British Jews, which denounced the EAPPI. Instead, the Anglicans waved support from "Jews for Justice for Palestinians" – another token fringe group.

Why do the obsessed leaders of these anti-Israel campaigns desperately need a façade of a few Jewish faces and so-called "voices for peace"?

The answer begins with their role in diverting attention and cleansing the immoral stains from overtly antisemitic theological themes, led by a Palestinian Christian NGO known as Sabeel. The Presbyterians, United Church and the United Methodists, among others, are official "partners" of Sabeel.

Sabeel promotes "Palestinian liberation theology," which includes supersessionism – a medieval doctrine that claims that Christians replaced the Jewish people in God's promises. This theology also revives the "deicide" charge, blaming "the Jews" for killing Jesus, by comparing Palestinians with the crucified Jesus and Israel as the crucifying power. These "tribal" and "primitive," in contrast to Christianity's "universalism." Sabeel's founder, Naim Ateek, recently said, "the establishment of Israel was a relapse to the most primitive concepts of an exclusive, tribal God." Sabeel also effectively denies the Jewish People's right to sovereign equality with its call for "one state."

While the vast majority of Jews and many Christians reject this abhorrent theology and its use in anti-Israel political warfare, the obsessed church-based BDS campaigners seek justification by giving prominence to the fringe exceptions. When JVP "stands in solidarity" with Sabeel's antisemitic, anti-Israel message the road is thus opened for Christians to follow. As JVP noted, "The churches pay particular attention to the voices of Jews."

In Canada, the United Church's actions are fundamentally immoral, and revive old hatreds against the Jewish people. To claim a moral mandate, the members of the United Church must cease the Israel-bashing, end all ties with Sabeel and other groups that promote hate, and stop exploiting token Jews in order to justify this gross injustice.

Gerald Steinberg

ancient teachings of contempt served as the basis for centuries of anti-Jewish persecution. After the Holocaust, the Vatican and mainline Protestants reinterpreted Christian texts to end this practice, but Sabeel and its partners have repackaged the old intolerance as a "progressive" post-colonialist ideal.

While mainline churches long rejected this hate-filled theology, Sabeel perpetuates them with its attacks on Judaism as

War clouds gather in the Middle East

Dark clouds are gathering ominously in the Middle East as two bitter enemies, Israel and Iran, escalate their war of words and sabre-rattling over Tehran's budding nuclear program.

The upsurge in tension has occurred against a drumbeat of reports that Iran is making steady progress in developing a nuclear bomb – Israel's worst nightmare – and that Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and his defence minister, Ehud Barak, are pushing for a pre-emptive strike on Iran's nuclear facilities in the autumn.

The spectre of a nuclear-armed Iran is a source of angst in Israel in light of Iran's incessant calls for its destruction.

Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, has described Israel as "a cancerous tumour in the heart of the Islamic world" that must be excised. The Iranian president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, has called Israel "an insult to all humanity." The speaker of Iran's parliament, Ali Larijani, has declared that the time has come for Israel's disappearance. Iranian Vice-President Mohammed-Reza Rahimi, in an antisemitic blast typical of the regime, has claimed that the Talmud sanctions the illegal international drug trade.

As if to confirm Iran's malevolent intentions toward Israel, Walid Sakariya, a Lebanese parliamentarian and a member of Hezbollah, which is aligned with Iran, has declared that Iran's quest for nuclear weapons is motivated by a desire "to finish off the Zionist enterprise."

Israeli media speculation that a war with Iran is imminent may be substantive, since Israel has let it be known that it will not tolerate an Iranian nuclear arsenal. But the increasingly vocal public debate in Israel about the possibility of a unilateral Israeli attack could be part of an Israeli tactic to pressure the United States to bomb Iran or to drastically tighten existing economic sanctions to which Iran has been subjected by the global community.

It is not a coincidence that rumours of war began to bubble to the surface following disclosures that three rounds of high-level negotiations between Iran and six world powers on the nuclear issue were essentially unsuccessful. The talks – which took place in Istanbul, Baghdad and Moscow in April, May and June turned on Iran's enrichment of uranium.

At these sessions, the United States, Britain, France, Russia, China and Germany called on Iran to abide by three United Nations resolutions to suspend all enrichment, ship its stock of 20 per cent enriched uranium out of the country and close an underground enrichment plant.

Despite a flurry of optimistic reports that Iran was ready to sign a historic deal that would satisfy the six powers, Iran's negotiator, Saeed Jalili, disappointed his interlocutors by reiterating the well-worn Iranian position that its enrichment program is for peaceful purposes and is non-negotiable.

In fact, the negotiations unfolded against a backdrop of mounting tension as Iran, smarting from its failure to persuade the six powers to ease sanctions, threatened to close the Strait of Hormuz, a vital Persian Gulf route through which one-fifth of the world's oil is transported.

Israel, from the outset, was skeptical that the talks would succeed.

Asserting that Iran was merely playing for time in a campaign of cynical deception, Netanyahu demanded that Iran freeze all enrichment activities above three per cent, ship enriched uranium to a trusted third-party country and dismantle an enrichment factory near the city of Qum, a course of action that Iran sharply rejected.

Barak was just as emphatic, casting doubt on the prospect that Iran could be induced to change its policy.

On a trip to Israel in mid-July, U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton basically confirmed Israel's suspicions and fears, acknowledging that Iran "has yet to make a strategic decision to address the international community's concerns."

Spurred on by Clinton's comment, Israeli Deputy Foreign Minister Danny Ayalon urged the six powers to officially declare diplomacy a failure.

U.S. President Barack Obama, however, believes that there is "time and space" for a diplomatic resolution of the problem, the most severe one Israel has faced since the Six Day War.

The Obama administration, which is committed to stopping rather than containing Iran's nuclear ambitions, claims that sanctions should be given a chance to work. Sanctions, designed to sever Iran from the oil market, have indubitably hurt Iran, having reduced its oil exports by 30 per cent and devalued its currency by 40 per cent.

Ahmadinejad, who in the past contemptuously dismissed the sanctions as ineffective, admitted recently they are "the most severe and strictest sanctions ever imposed on a country."

But Netanyahu argues that sanctions have not basically altered Iran's behaviour and have given Tehran yet more time to enrich its growing stockpile of uranium.

Iran has reportedly made steady progress in weaponizing its nuclear program, but is not yet on the brink of actually building a bomb, experts believe. Iran has admitted that it has significantly increased the number of active centrifuges enriching uranium.

With Iran apparently well on its way toward becoming a nuclear power, like Israel, Pakistan and India, the Israeli government has dropped broad hints that it may have no choice but to resort to brute military force to deal with what some say is an existential threat.

"I am fully aware of the difficulties of preventive action," said Barak in July. "But it is clear to me that coping with the threat will be many times more complex, dangerous and costly, both in terms of human life and in terms of resources, than a preventive strike." Barak elaborated on this theme last month, saying that a war with a nuclear-armed Iran would be "incomparably" more dangerous and costly to Israel than a conflict with a conventionally armed Iran.

On July 31, Netanyahu said he has yet to decide whether to order a strike on Iran, but

Ayatollah Ali Khamenei

, the chief of staff, Gen. Benny Gantz, noted that the Israeli armed forces are "prepared and ready to act."

Since then, the Israeli media has published and broadcast reports suggesting that Netanyahu and Barak want to hit Iran before its nuclear program reaches the point of no return, the so-called "zone of immunity," as Barak has described it.

At this juncture, all visible signs point to a war, but there is fierce resistance to it in Israel. Shaul Mofaz, Israel's opposition leader and a former defence minister, has charged that Netanyahu and Barak are leading Israel toward a potentially "disastrous" war with Iran. Mofaz says that an Israeli strike would, at best, set back Iran by only a few months or a year and spark a regional war, an appraisal shared by the chairman of the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff, Gen. Martin Dempsey. But Israel's ambassador to the United States, Michael Oren, holds that a strike, however effective, would be worth the effort and Iran's vengeance.

Oren's view is disputed by leading Israeli politicians and security officials, past and present, who argue that a solo Israeli strike would embroil Israel in a protracted period of warfare, claim the lives of many Israelis and cost the Israeli economy a whopping $42 billion.

Israel should think very carefully before plunging into the cauldron.

Parent fights to get handicapped son into school

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Marcy White has spent the last five months fighting for her 10-year-old son Jacob Trossman to attend Elkhorn Public School more than one half-day a week, but on Aug. 27 she was informed that the Toronto District School Board wouldn't allow it.

Jacob has Pelizaeus-Merzbacher Disease and is unable to walk or talk. White feels the school meets his needs in ways that other schools can't.

after learning of the decision. She said she was not given a reason that Jacob would not be allowed to spend more than half a day a week at the school.

In response to a request to talk to Donna Quan, the board's deputy director of academics, who made the decision, TDSB communications officer Ryan Bird said that, "due to privacy and confidentiality concerns, we cannot comment on specific cases. However, I can say that whenever decisions are made with specific accommodations, the dignity and safety of students is paramount."

TDSB trustee Howard Goodman has been an advocate for Jacob and – as he put it – a navigator/translator for White and TDSB staff since she contacted him for help earlier this year.

In March, The CJA published White's first-person account about Jacob's experience at Elkhorn, where he was integrated for a half-day a week last year. She wrote that it was an "outstanding" arrangement, and that everyone benefited from it.

White said that within a week of her article appearing, she received a phone call from then school principal Paul Farrell to inform her that the TDSB wanted the arrangement to end by Easter, but he arranged for Jacob to stay until the end of the school year, she said.

White would like her son to be at Elkhorn three days a week, or even five.

"All I want is for my son to have the academic and social education he deserves," White said. "He's been there for over a year. We should know that it works."

She said that at his other school, Sunny View Public School, there are no children his age at his cognitive level, and the school doesn't follow the standard curriculum, although the staff is "caring [and] loving." He takes part in a communications program there.

White said that Jacob is at his age level cognitively, but that people are quick to assume he doesn't understand, because he doesn't speak and has trouble moving.

"He can understand things, and can respond and learn," she said. At Elkhorn, there were also social benefits: for the first time, he had play dates with his schoolmates.

White noted that there were benefits for other students as well. In a letter she provided, Cheryl Libman – Jacob's teacher at Elkhorn last year – said Jacob's impact was "so significant that his peers 'argue' over who will sit beside Jake, walk beside him down the hall, hold his hand or help him during art or French."

She also wrote that Elkhorn has been "an incredibly accepting and safe" environment for Jacob.

White said there have also been letters of support from parents at the school.

She said she was told that there needs to be a ramp at Elkhorn for Jacob to attend the school. But, she said, "there is a ramp. There's even a handicapped parking spot in the lot."

Scholar tells life story in nearly extinct language

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Solly Lévy, a Moroccan-born scholar, writer and one of the few experts of the Judeo-Spanish language called Hakétia, will be launching his latest project next week in Toronto.

La Vida en Hakétia - Para que no se pierda, or Life in Hakétia: So As Not To Lose It, is a set of five audio CDs that tell the story of Lévy's life in Morocco from 1939 to 1968, the year he immigrated to Montreal.

At the Sept. 10 event at Petah Tikvah Congregation presented by the Communauté Juive Marocaine de Toronto, Lévy will read excerpts from his autobiographical audio book and present musical interludes throughout the performance.

"The musical interludes are clearly related to the context... Some is rooted in the Jewish identity, and in the Arabic identity of Morocco," he said.

"They will hear myself telling the story of my life since my birth... There is nostalgia, poetry, and there is a lot of humour. I tell my story, but with no sadness. Although there is a point when I realize, when I'm departing to Montreal that I'm cutting a chain of generations that date back to the 15th century [in Morocco]. I realize I'm the one that cut the link, cut the chain and went away, and this is forever."

He said one of the main characters in the audio book is the language in which the story is told, his mother tongue called Hakétia, which is on the verge of extinction.

Lévy explained that unlike Ladino - the Judeo-Spanish language influenced by Hebrew, Aramaic, Arabic and Turkish, which has been written and published for centuries - Hakétia, a mix of old Spanish, Hebrew and Arabic, which was spoken on the northeast coast of Morocco, is largely oral.

He said that Jewish scholars from northern Morocco never wrote in Hakétia because, in spite of the Spanish Inquisition in 1492 when Jews were forced to convert or be expelled, Jews always felt a cultural link with Spain and the desire to write in the best Spanish of the times.

In a booklet that Lévy wrote to accompany the CD collection, which explains the history of the language, he said Hakétia was condemned to a purely oral existence, because "it has always been considered the language of the kitchen, always of the affective, not the intellectual plane."

He said Hakétia is a language of "laughter and tears, well-wishing, insults, condemnation; a language considered by many as one of the lower class... Today, amongst the baby-boomers whose families are from this region, there is, however, an awakening: a longing for, a sincere interest in the language of their grandparents."

For years, Lévy has been on a personal mission to remedy the lack of literary and scholarly works in his mother tongue by publishing his own material.

He wrote and directed four comedies in Hakétia, which were published in 1992 called Yahasrá (Those Were the Days) and is also the author of the second full-length book ever published in Hakétia, El libro de Solomó (The Book of Solomon).

He said he is encouraged by the few people who have shown an interest in reviving the language.

"I recently received a collection of children's tales written by a lady who lives in Israel [named Luisa Lucy Benarroch Nahón] written in Hakétia, which is very encouraging. There is also a lady in New York who has a website called Voices of Hakétia, and she is very active and writes stories," he said.

"It's a good sign. I'm trying not to be too optimistic because you can't overnight revive a language that was condemned to be an oral vehicle of communication... But if you aim high... you never know, maybe there will be more people writing and creating."

He said he's hoping the event will attract members of the community that span across a number of generations.

He said if he notices that there are a number of younger people in his audience, he'll make sure to add commentaries and translations in English throughout his performance.

"My other ambition is to awaken the interest here in Toronto of the non-Sephardi community to be aware that we exist."

TAG Canada will be 'positive influence'

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Yossi Ives founded the Tag Institute for Jewish Social Values, and its sister organization, Tag International Development, because he became increasingly uncomfortable with the "self-imposed isolation" of his Orthodox Jewish world in London, England.

"[The two organizations] are separate entities unified by a common cause: Jewish contribution to the wider world," he said.

Now his London-based organizations – one of which works in developing countries, while the other addresses social issues in the western world – have a fledgling presence here. Seymour Epstein, director of Tag Canada, expected the new group would be incorporated soon, after which it would apply for charitable status.

Like its parent organizations, Tag Canada will have a dual focus. It will be a Canadian organization with its own projects, not a "Friends of" group, said Epstein, who is the former director of Toronto's Mercaz (formerly the Board of Jewish Education). He was hired in May to set up and run Tag here.

The new group is considering a project with the aboriginal communities in Ontario, Epstein said. As well, it will be supportive of Tag's international projects.

Rabbi Ives, the former spiritual leader of London's Richmond Synagogue, started Tag – which has a combined annual budget of $1.4 million (US) – in January 2010. He coined the name as an acronym for the Hebrew words "Torah" and "Gedulah," signifying "spiritual learning" and "worldly greatness" respectively.

Funding comes from private donors, and like-minded NGOs are also involved in Tag projects. The organization works with partners in the countries where projects are located, as well as in Israel, for its international projects.

Recently, the rabbi spoke at what was technically the first board meeting of Tag Canada, at the home of Gella Rothstein.

"There are no rules that prevent us from having a more dynamic interaction with the world," Rabbi Ives said.

Having grown up in "an intensely Jewish environment," Rabbi Ives said he appreciates Jewish values and the importance of Jewish learning. "There's plenty we could do to be a really positive influence on the world."

The 39-year-old rabbi said he found it "astonishing" that he never came across a Jewish idea when studying for his PhD in social science.

Seymour Epstein

The Tag Institute for Jewish Social Values includes a research component to find new ways, based on Jewish ideas, of addressing issues such as bullying, mid-life crises and aging.

As well, as a life coach, he has instituted research on single issues, using a coaching-based approach.

Jews have had to cope with difficult challenges, he noted. "We've learned how to adapt, bounce back and do great things. What about our experience could help other people?"

For the development organization, Rabbi Ives wanted to draw on Israel's experience to help developing countries.

"How could we bottle up some of that expertise, experience, know-how, so that others could benefit and solve their own problems?"

"It's the right thing to do," he said. As well, he added, the Jewish people, and Israel as a country, cannot afford to be isolated. "The fact is, we gain enormously from doing this, but that's not the main reason."

His work with Tag has taken him as far afield as Azerbaijan, a Muslim country where he said Jews and Muslims have co-existed well for centuries. Other projects – mostly in the areas of health, agriculture and community development – are based in more than a dozen countries, among them Sri Lanka, India and Rwanda.

About the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem

The Canadian Society for Yad Vashem is one of the largest and most prominent societies among Yad Vashem's 28 representative bodies worldwide. The Society supports Yad Vashem's initiatives and implements its important vision across Canada. Through its educational and commemorative activities, the Society carries out Yad Vashem's mission of ensuring that the Holocaust and its lessons are forever engraved in the memory of humankind.

About the Remember. Reflect. Recommit Campaign

The Remember. Reflect. Recommit Campaign will revitalize the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem Holocaust Wall of Remembrance, a memorial site at Earl Bales Park. This site was built by the founders of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem to commemorate those who perished in the Holocaust and to pay tribute to Survivors, who, after rebuilding their lives in Canada, have since passed away. Structures at the Holocaust Wall of Remembrance, existing and new, as well as landscaped gardens, will serve as a backdrop to meaningful events such as the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem Yizkor Ceremony, programs, and initiatives that will allow people of all faiths to learn about the Holocaust and its universal lessons. The campaign offers a variety of prominent naming opportunities, which will allow you to honour the legacy of a loved one.

About Yizkor

Yizkor, which means "remembrance" in Hebrew, is Judaism's memorial prayer that is traditionally recited by family members to remember and elevate the souls of their dearly departed loved ones. Occurring during Judaism's most holy days, between Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur, the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem Yizkor Ceremony is the public observance for our community to remember those who were murdered in the Shoah and to pay homage to Holocaust Survivors.

U.S. Conservative pundit to visit Toronto

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Bill Whittle, an up-and-coming American Conservative pundit, will be in Toronto next week to share his ideas about the internal threats to western civilization.

Whittle, a regular commentator at PJTV.com, a subscription-based Internet television service where he hosts a regular segment called Afterburner with Bill Whittle, said while western civilization has always been the target of external threats, it's the internal threats that concern him most.

"When you have the president of Iran saying that Israel is a cancer that needs to be wiped off the face of the Earth... this is the kind of thing we've had to face as a civilization our entire history," Whittle said.

"Israel is a western nation placed in the middle of the Middle East. That's why it's successful and all of its neighbours aren't. You can make a lot of close connections between the things that drive antisemitism and anti-Americanism," he added.

Despite the aggressive rhetoric coming from Israel's and America's enemies, Whittle said "the problem is never really what is outside the city walls, the problem is that somebody opens up the gates at midnight and lets these people in."

He said the biggest threat to western civilization is "an extremely self-destructive virus that's sapping our will to fight from within because it's destroying our faith in ourselves."

Whittle, who was invited to deliver a lecture on Sept. 10 titled "The Assault on Civilization: The Threats Both Within And Beyond The City Walls," by the Speakers Action Group, a non-profit organization founded by the Canadian Antisemitism Education Foundation, is not one to mince words.

Bill Whittle

In some of his videos, which can be viewed on his YouTube channel that boasts more than 18,000 subscribers, Whittle has called left-wing documentary filmmaker Michael Moore "the mendacious Michigan Manatee of Malevolence," describes progressivism as a "hell-bound philosophy," and accuses U.S. President Barack Obama of being "raised by feral Marxists out in the wild."

He said one of the concepts that threaten western civilization from within is moral equivalency and cultural relativism.

"If I live in a society where everyone is free to practice their own religion... versus a place where if you don't agree with us, we'll chop your head off. I say that is worse and I'm not afraid to say it's worse," Whittle said.

"The crux of the issue is that we're being told we can't make that distinction and told we can't fight for it intellectually."

He said the progressive ideology is to blame.

"The fundamental premise of progressivism is no matter how much activism and changes we make, the changes are always going to be better... [Conservatives] believe that our society has long passed, on many different fronts, the point of maximum advantage."

Whittle added that progressivism is pushing the west past the "top of the bell graph when any further progress doesn't make things better, it starts to make things worse. We're now on the backside of the curve... There comes a point when you have to stand on your principles and say, 'No, not only do I not think we need to go forward, we could stand to go back a little bit.'"

Now what?

To err is human: to really foul things up, it takes a computer. Thanks to computer technology, what yesteryear was a very localized error today can become a global event. In the vernacular, it goes viral.

Such was the case a few weeks ago, when a major error in the El Al computer system had the airline offering trips to Israel at prices that were obviously too good to be true.

Just to give you an idea, based on these prices as they were offered on the Internet, people were able to book a round trip to Israel for two that amounted to less than the price for a single ticket, with money to spare.

It was a colossal mistake emanating from El Al. El Al, to its credit, announced that it would honour the tickets at the advertised (in error) prices. This means that according to the strict letter of the law, those people who lucked in grabbed a great bargain.

Consumers should pause before acting on El Al computer error

Now comes the ethical dilemma. This is not a questioning of those who snatched up the tickets. The tickets were available, and they took full advantage, as they were entitled. But we now know that it was a mistake. Is there an obligation to return the tickets? Are those with these tickets obliged to call El Al and say the following: "We realize this was a mistake, and are hereby returning the tickets, either for a full refund or for a credit toward a future purchase of tickets?"

One can make a potent argument for the position that there is no such legal obligation. My question to all those who have such tickets is: granted that you are within your rights, are you also right to hold on to these tickets? Or, knowing as you do that it was a mistake, should you go the extra kilometre and return the tickets?

That is a different and more challenging question. To my mind, the answer is clear, and for a number of reasons. This is a classic instance of adhering to the letter of the law being a potential detriment. It evokes the famous observation of the sages that Jerusalem was destroyed because the people kept scrupulously to the law (Talmud, Baba Mezia 30b). Judaism demands of us more than just being legal. We are asked to go beyond the letter of the law, or more accurately, inside (lifnim) the line of the law (based on Exodus 18:20 and further elaborated on in Talmud, Baba Kamma, 99b-100a).

To be above reproach, to refuse to put others in difficult circumstances, to do that which is noble and upright, are all Judaic responsibilities, and more truly expressive of the Halachah in its highest sense.

Of all the wonderful ethical imperatives that are transmitted in the Torah, the most pervasive, and as well best known, is the famous directive: "Love your fellow as you love yourself" (Leviticus, 19:18). Such a lovely expression, until it hits the pocketbook. The more literal translation of these famous words is: love that which accrues to your fellow as if it were your own. This refers to the selfhood of others, their dignity, their esteem and, yes, their property.

Here comes the crucial test. Would we be happy if we were on the other side of the equation – not the ones taking advantage of the mistake, and instead the ones being disadvantaged by the mistake? Surely we would not be happy. The moment we realize this is the moment that the ethical obligation kicks in. Since we would not want to be so financially pounced upon, we can therefore have no part of being the pouncers. In other words, the higher ethical responsibilities as enunciated in Jewish thought, obligate us all to return the tickets. Instead of going to the Holy Land, we are urged to live in a holy space; to give up airplane tickets in favour of tickets to plainly profound righteousness.

Based on a most effective ad that appears on television quite regularly, here is the final take.

Obtaining airline tickets for next to nothing: estimated value – a few hundred to possibly as much as a few thousand dollars.

Returning the tickets for a refund and thereby teaching our children and grandchildren, indeed our entire community, the meaning of integrity, compassion, sensitivity and unassailable ethics: estimated value – absolutely priceless, and enduring forever.

Final reflections on the London Olympics

The Games of the 30th Olympiad are now written into the history books, a testament to the prowess, spirit and endurance of the athletes who participated, and to the marvels of modern communication that so vividly brought the Olympic spectacle into the living rooms of a sports-obsessed planet.

Despite earlier logistical and security concerns, London 2012 was about as good as any event of its size could possibly have been, managed with discipline and precision, and providing an optimal environment for record-breaking achievements.

And inasmuch as the superhuman achievements of swimmer Michael Phelps and sprinter Usain Bolt will long be remembered, the passion and poise of American gymnast Aly Reisman and the courage of South African Oscar (Blade Runner) Pistorius, remind us also of what these Games ought really to be about. Then, of course, there was the stunning moment when the French swimmer, Fabien Gilot, when raising his arms in triumph, revealed on his inner biceps, a tattoo in Hebrew that said, "I am nothing without them," a moving tribute to Auschwitz survivor. Max Goldschmidt, who was married to Gilot's grandmother, and was an inspiration to the young swimmer.

With each Olympics there are surprises, often punctuated by unexpected performances by particular athletes. This year, the British outdid themselves with a medal haul that placed them third overall, behind the United States and China. At the other end of the spectrum were the 109 nations that left London without a single medal. Among them was Israel, which failed to make the podium for the first time since 1988, causing sports minister Limor Livnat to call for "a shakeup of observed during the opening ceremonies, to commemorate the 11 Israelis who were murdered by Palestinian terrorists at the 1972 Munich Games. As pleas to do so mounted, so, too, did the voices of resistance become shriller and more defensive. The pervasive suspicion that the IOC brass stuck to their guns out of fear of repercussions from Arab delegations was further reinforced when no hint of censure was uttered after the head of the "Palestinian Olympic Committee" brazenly declared that it would be "racist" to express solidarity with the Munich victims.

That IOC president Jacques Rogge and his coterie of tag-alongs received a frosty reception at a memorial hosted by the Israeli Embassy in London could not have been more deserved. The capitulation and hypocrisy of these "Lords of the Rings" will forever tarnish the exalted ideals of the Olympic enterprise.

As this summer's Olympiad fades into memory, Rio de Janeiro 2016 begins to slip into focus. Will the IOC's position on the Munich 11 change by then? Don't bet on it. A gold medal win by an Israeli athlete in Brazil is probably more achievable.

My View

the system."

But aside from dreams realized and dreams shattered – all part of the vicissitudes of elite competition that can separate winners from also-rans by just fractions of a second – there was also to these Games a smoldering undercurrent of disappointment related not to sport itself but to one of sport's pre-eminent governing bodies, the International Olympic Committee (IOC).

Even more so in retrospect, there is no convincing reason why a moment's silence should not have been

You're forgiven, maybe

Last week we looked at the importance of asking forgiveness on the eve of the High Holy Days. Today: must we forgive?

British Chief Rabbi Jonathan Sacks points to the Torah for a famous example of an individual who was wronged, received an apology and was then faced with a choice. When Joseph reveals himself to his brothers, he tells them, "Do not be distressed and do not be angry with yourselves for selling me here, because it was to save lives that God sent me ahead of you." That calms them, but they still worry that after their father, Jacob, dies, Joseph will finally let them have it. He doesn't. Joseph's forgiveness is genuine. [<http://bit.ly/sorry21>]

If you've been wronged and have received an apology, do you have to accept it? Rabbi Joseph Telushkin says there are three scenarios according to Jewish tradition.

• When forgiveness is obligatory: the hurt inflicted is not irrevocable and you've been asked for forgiveness. This represents the overwhelming number of cases.

• When forgiveness is forbidden. If the hurt has been inflicted on someone else, you don't have the power to forgive the transgressor.

• When forgiveness is optional: if the individual does not ask for forgiveness, you may decide to forgive nonetheless. Or if someone has slandered you and apologizes, you can choose not to forgive because the damage from the slander continues despite the apology. [<http://bit.ly/sorry17>]

Jewish & Digital

Mark Mietkiewicz

Here are two examples that test the capacity to forgive. Alison Golub writes about listening to the writer and activist Elie Wiesel at Boston University several years ago. "When a student asked him about forgiveness, he replied, 'I cannot and I don't want to forgive the killers of children. I ask God not to forgive.' When another student asked him how he was able to live so fully while still harbouring such resentment, he said simply, 'I want to keep that pain. That zone of pain must stay inside me.'" [<http://bit.ly/sorry18>]

witz for medical experimentation. Eva never spoke of those horrors until the 1980s, when she began to contact other twins who had undergone similar experiences. She then received what she calls "a mad request" – to lecture to doctors in Boston along with a former Nazi doctor. That invitation eventually led to her meeting and forgiving one of those doctors. It also led to her establishing the Indiana-based CANDLES Holocaust Museum where she documents those deadly Auschwitz lab experiments and explains why forgiveness is so important to her. [<http://bit.ly/sorry19>]

"I believe with every fibre of my being that every human being has the right to live without the pain of the past. For most people, there is a big obstacle to forgiveness because society expects revenge. It seems we need to honour our victims but I always wonder if my dead loved ones would want me to live with pain and anger until the end of my life," she wrote. "Some survivors do not want to let go of the pain. They call me a traitor and accuse me of talking in their name. I have never done this. Forgiveness is as personal as chemotherapy – I do it for myself." [<http://bit.ly/sorry20>]

The call of the shofar

Rabbi David Cadoch

We are 10 days away from Rosh Hashanah, the Day of Judgment, when we all pass before the Almighty, who will decide our fate for the year. The machzor we read during the holiday services describes the process in a very serious tone designed to inspire fear and repentance.

"How many shall pass away and how many shall be born? Who shall live out his allotted time and who shall depart before his time? Who shall be at rest and who shall wander? Who shall enjoy well-being and who shall suffer tribulation? Who shall be poor and who shall be rich? Who shall be humbled and who shall be exalted," the Unetaneh Tokef prayer asks.

We, in turn, need to ask ourselves: why is it necessary to use such frightening language?

To live a full life, we must find meaning in our lives, and Judaism has as many answers as questions. The call of the shofar at this time of year is just that – a call to awaken from the slumber of the mundane and uninspiring.

The sole purpose of the strong language of the High Holiday prayers is to impel us to find personal meaning in the teachings of the Torah. In essence, what the Almighty expects of us is that we will make the Torah our personal acquisition and develop a personal relationship with our Creator. In order for Torah to have meaning, we need to intimately imbue our lives with its teachings.

This journey initially sounds like an extraordinary task that fills us with doubt and fear of change.

Rabbinic Reflections

However, once the journey is undertaken, the harsh language softens and begins to make us, and the world around us, more spiritual. This is the meaning of Rosh Hashanah, the Day of Judgment. Rosh Hashanah places us in the position of a judge scrutinizing our purpose and actions in the hope of repenting. Once this process begins, the Almighty assures us of a blessed and sweet year. This is why Rosh Hashanah is a festival of joy and not of sadness.

In searching for meaning, a person does not find life mundane or meaningless, as every opportunity exists to reveal some profound connection with our soul and our Creator.

Even trials, sufferings and challenges once seen in this light become pathways to elevate us beyond the worldly and material toil of our errors and misunderstandings. But this can only be true if one makes this a personal quest for meaning!

We must remember that whatever happens to us is part of a plan for a higher purpose as orchestrated by the Almighty.

Wishing you all a meaningful year blessed with the sweetness of serenity of mind and body!

Rabbi David Cadoch is the spiritual leader for Shabbat and holidays at Beth HaRambam Synagogue at Maimonides Hospital, and is a mushmach of the late HaGaon HaRav Aryeh Leib Baron.

Gossip isn't always harmless

The blight of gossip has been with us for a long time. Is it a part of human nature? Do we all have the gossip gene?

The Bible inveighs and warns against it from Exodus: "You shall not utter a false report." From Leviticus: "Do not go about as a tale bearer among your people." The Talmud cautions: "Your friend has a friend, and your friend's friend has a friend: be discreet."

On Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur repentant Jews will attend synagogues to confess their sins and wrongdoing. Prominent among them will be the sin of lashon hara – the evil tongue.

As many as 31 of the 613 mitzvot are concerned, one way or another, with gossip and slander. It is sinful to initiate gossip and equally sinful to repeat it – and it is even a sin to listen to it.

Gossip has many faces and voices. There are some for whom gossip is innocent, casual and entertaining party talk. What better vehicle for easy banter, for laugh-inciting chatter, for time-passing conversation than a choice item of gossip? It adds zest and sparkle to any gathering. No harm is really meant. It comes spontaneously and irrepressibly because it is just too "good" to overlook or stifle. Who was it that said, "I never repeat gossip, so listen carefully."

In his recent book titled Gossip, Joseph Epstein maintains that the Internet is a destructive, if effective force, in the ruination of reputation and the invasion of privacy. He refers to an 18-year-old university student who took his own life after two classmates photographed him during a sexual encounter and then put the results on Twitter. He wonders, "Who knew such things, at the service of gossip, could be deadly instruments?"

Politicians, celebrities, financiers, entertainers, devotees of glitserati society are especially vulnerable. What joy there is in pulling down the icons and statues. What fun to malign the mighty.

The American presidential campaign now underway will expend untold millions of dollars on advertising and propaganda. Half-truths and distortions will abound. TV channels, radio stations and newspapers will benefit as bewildered voters make their uncertain way to the polls.

Epstein wonders whether widespread gossip leads to the dumbing down of cultural and intellectual life. We all suffer from intellectual impatience, and it may be that after decades of television watching, photo ops, quotable quotes and the rest, we suffer from a much-reduced attention span.

He asserts that gossip, after all, doesn't call for much in the way of attention or patience. Quite the reverse: its penchant is for the bottom line, going for the groin – who is stealing and how much – who is hiding the most bestial private behaviour. Gossip serves it up straight; leave your subtlety or taste for complex reality at the door.

Gossip often starts quite innocently, gradually descends into belittlement, then calumny – and finally slander.

The cautious words of Will Rogers should be heeded: "So live your life that you wouldn't be ashamed to sell the family parrot to the town gossip."

Ottawa federation CEO steps down

Bellman oversaw growth in annual campaign

Diane Koven
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — After 15 years as CEO of the Jewish Federation of Ottawa (JFO), Mitchell Bellman has decided to step down and seek a new career challenge.

"I believe it is the right time for me to move on to something new. I also believe that the community would benefit from the opportunity to search for a successor with adequate time and planning so it can make the best decision regarding its future," said Bellman in his letter of resignation to the board of directors.

Bellman had been director of communications and public affairs for the federation for two years before assuming his present position. When the position became available, he was appointed acting executive director

(the title was later changed to CEO) and encouraged to apply for the permanent position. The chairman of the board of directors at the time, the late Lawrence Greenberg, discouraged him from doing so, telling the then 29-year-old Bellman he was simply too young and inexperienced for the job.

"I stubbornly applied for the job anyway," said Bellman, "and was successful. He and I were neighbours and often took walks together. He later told me he regretted what he had said and was glad I had the job. We worked well together."

For 15 years, Bellman has worked well with both JFO staff and volunteers. JFO chair Debbie Halton-Weiss speaks highly of his skills in leading the community. "Mitchell led the federation through a period of incredible growth. He joined the organization just as a capital campaign was being launched to raise funds to build a new campus. He oversaw the development of the new Jewish community centre and long-term care centre and the move of the community's institutions to the new west-side campus," she said.

"He also oversaw a significant growth in the funds raised in the federation's annual campaign and led the community through two emergency campaigns to raise funds for Israel during the Second Lebanon War and the terrorist assault of suicide bombings. In 2002, Mitchell led the community in organizing a national rally on Parliament Hill in support of Israel that attracted nearly 15,000 people from across Canada."

Bellman says he leaves the JFO with mixed emotions, but "15 years is a long time and both for myself and the organization, it is time for a creative change." He will stay with JFO until his replacement is found.

He doesn't know where his career path will lead next, but Bellman says he is seeking a change. "I am interested in doing something interesting. I want to move somewhere that I can make a good contribution, where I can be challenged," he said.

"I am going to miss working with this Jewish community. The job kept me very connected with Israel, where I have made many, many good friends, and I hope that in some way I will be able to maintain those connections. Whatever comes my way, I intend to remain involved in the Jewish community and with Israel."

Kitchener synagogue erects eruv in city

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

The board of Beth Jacob Synagogue in Kitchener is hopeful that the recent construction of an eruv will convince observant Jews from big cities that it is possible to live a fulfilling, Orthodox lifestyle in a smaller community.

As of last month, Kitchener became the latest Canadian city to boast an eruv, a formalized demarcation between private and public areas that allows strictly observant Jews to carry things from home to home and to shul and back.

The eruv allows young families to push a stroller on Shabbat, which would not otherwise be halachically permissible. It was constructed under the supervision of Beth Jacob Rabbi Nevo Zuckerman and Los Angeles-based Rabbi David Rue.

"Our aim is to ensure that we have a fully kosher and halachah-compliant eruv meeting the most exacting standards," Rabbi Zuckerman said in a statement.

The shul's religious chair, Simon Adler, told The CJA the idea came from Beth Jacob's board of directors.

"We've got a young rabbi with a young family and we could clearly see how inconvenient it was not to have one," Adler said.

Rabbi Zuckerman, a 34-year-old father of six, has also been very active in working with the local Sobey's grocery store to increase the availability of kosher meats, fish, and cheese.

While there isn't a high percentage of the 100-family membership that currently uses the eruv, "we're trying to create the conditions for people who are observant who might want to move here," Adler said.

"That is why we are scrupulous about our services, kosher kitchen, mechitzah, and now our eruv," Beth Jacob president Howard Dolman said.

"We particularly want young Orthodox couples facing unsustainable housing prices in Toronto to know that they can find a religious life in Kitchener along with an affordable home."

Adler described the eruv as "a very large, irregular circle surrounding the shul. I would guess, from the shul to the furthest point, it's maybe two kilometres."

He added that it was constructed with the co-operation of the owners of the hydro poles, Kitchener-Wilmot Hydro Inc.

"They gave us permission to attach the lechies [wires] to the poles," which are at ground level, he said.

The Kitchener-Waterloo area, which boasts a Jewish community of about 2,500, has been home to the Orthodox congregation for the past 103 years. The synagogue on Stirling Avenue was built in 1963.

"We'd like people to think about Kitchener-Waterloo because we're close to Toronto, but we do have an Orthodox shul and we now have an eruv and you can have an observant lifestyle here," Adler said.

"The rabbi mentioned that at least one person had called him and said he didn't even know there were Jews in Kitchener. So, this is a way of trying to make it known as much as we can. We've been here for over 100 years now, but we're just kind of refreshing ourselves."

Winnipeg federation rescues seniors centre

Gwen Seter will get $2,000 a month for at least two years

Myron Love

Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Gwen Seter Creative Living Centre, a Jewish seniors centre in north Winnipeg and the only Orthodox Union-certified caterer and provider of kosher meals on wheels in Winnipeg, has been given a temporary new lease on life, thanks to the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg.

After several months of negotiations, federation has arrived at a deal with the National Council of Jewish Women of Canada (NCJW) — which owns the Gwen Seter building — to provide the Winnipeg centre with $2,000 a month in funding for at least two years. The funding is retroactive to last January.

Under the terms of the agreement, NCJW has extended Gwen Seter's current lease to May 31, 2016. The lease was scheduled to expire as of May 31, 2014. National Council agrees not to sell the building with possession date prior to May 31, 2014, without Gwen Seter's consent. The NCJW may sell the building with a possession date following May 31, 2014, with six months' prior notice to Gwen Seter, and the centre has the first right of refusal.

The agreement is the end phase of a relationship between the NCJW and the Gwen Seter Centre and its predecessor, the Golden Age Club, that goes back 63 years. In 1949, NCJW, Winnipeg section, started the Golden Age Club, Canada's first senior's drop-in centre. Twenty-five years ago, NCJW purchased the property at 1588 Main St., and the Golden Age Club became the Gwen Seter Creative Living Centre at that address. (The centre was named after the late Gwen Seter, a NCJW leader in Winnipeg.)

Gwen Seter is a multi-purpose senior centre that promotes the physical, mental, social and spiritual well-being of older adults, said Marilyn Regiec, the centre's executive director. The main goal of the centre is to foster independent living and participation in community life through social, educational, cultural, fitness, healthy lifestyle and recreational programming, including book clubs, community Internet access, cultural programming, kosher meals on wheels, fitness classes and bingo.

The building also houses the offices of NCJW, Winnipeg section, and Jewish Child and Family Services' north Winnipeg office.

Up until about five years ago, the National Council paid for all of the building's operating costs. In 2009 though, the Winnipeg chapter of NCJW experienced a serious funding shortfall and could no longer support the seniors program. The Gwen Seter centre took on the responsibility for the building's operating costs through a combination of contributions from its 300 or so members, government grants and financial support from the federation. A four-year lease agreement to that effect, between the seniors program and NCJW, was signed as of May 31, 2010.

According to a joint press release by the parties involved in the new agreement, "it is NCJW's intention to sell the building at 1588 Main St. and to use the sales proceeds to fund its 'next big project.' The NCJW board has commenced its strategic planning process and is excited at the prospect of being able to contribute to the community in a new way and to tackle a different area of perceived need."

The Gwen Seter Creative Living Centre board of directors, Regiec said, "is working with the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg regarding the needs and provision of community services to Jewish older adults and suitable placement of same. The future of the Gwen Seter program forms part of these discussions."

"We are all looking forward to a bright future of contributing to the vibrancy of Jewish community life in Winnipeg," she said.

Hillel reaches out to campus organizations

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

As 5772 comes to an end and we get set to ring in the Jewish New Year, Hillel of Greater Toronto has many reasons to celebrate the past year and has much to look forward to in the days ahead.

At the annual Hillel Institute conference, held in St. Louis last month, Hillel of Greater Toronto was awarded the Indispensable Member of the University Community Award.

The award recognizes Hillels that demonstrate excellence in promoting the organization's strategic plan to encourage Jewish students to become involved in Jewish community activities.

Hillel of Greater Toronto, which represents about 8,000 Jewish post-secondary students in the Toronto area, was likely singled out in part for its success in implementing Hillel's Ask Big Questions initiative.

Hillel of Greater Toronto's associate executive director Rabbi Aaron Katchen explained that the University of Toronto was one of 13 campuses in North America chosen by Hillel International to launch the pilot program partly funded by the Einhorn Family Charitable Trust.

"It's coming from a program developed at Northwestern University Hillel and the then-campus Rabbi [Josh] Feigelson. He brought the program to Hillel International and we tweaked it," Rabbi Katchen said.

He said the idea behind the program is to "use the power of the question to build community and move away from the hard questions that are divisive in nature," such as questions surrounding the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Big questions are those that matter to everyone, regardless of their religion, culture, race, gender or political beliefs.

"A big question invites people in. It brings together people who can be on opposite sides of a dispute and make them able to see their similarities and build trust," Rabbi Katchen said.

"A question could be, 'Where do you feel at home? When do you feel secure? What are you thankful for?'... It's not about what the right answer is, it's about, 'What is your answer?'"

The hope, he added, is that if a hard question that has the potential to polarize students does come up, students will be better equipped to have respectful dialogue.

Rabbi Katchen said each Hillel was encouraged to adapt the program to fit the "personality, demographic and makeup" of the campus.

When the program began last year, each of U of T's four Hillel interns were required to reach out to a minimum of 30 students and engage them in big question conversations.

Rabbi Katchen explained that after the interns had one-on-one conversations with the 30 students, they'd have to organize monthly conversations for a group of five to 10 of those students.

For the staff at Hillel of Greater Toronto, one of the goals was to turn the initiative into a campus-wide conversation.

Apparently, U of T administrators took notice.

Hillel extended its reach to partner with a number of organizations on campus, including U of T's student activity centre (Hart House), the Multifaith Centre and the Ecumenical Chaplaincy.

He said that since he started promoting the Ask Big Questions program beyond Hillel, other campus organizations have begun to evaluate ways to incorporate the program's philosophy into other areas of university life.

"They've been using us as a resource to elevate their own work. There are different groups that we are a part of now that are looking at campus-wide questions," Rabbi Katchen said.

"We're being seen as experts on this and we're there to provide training and resources, and people can run with it and incorporate the philosophy wherever they are on campus."

He added that Hillel is invested in building relationships with everyone at the university.

"We're looking at developing relationships and having ongoing conversations with the different levels of the university so we're not just seen as reactive, but that we're a partner with the university and not just an island where Jewish students are off in the corner," he said.

"We want to make sure to incorporate the Jewish voice into all levels of the university."

CIJA calls for input on United Church

The recent decision of the United Church of Canada's General Council to boycott products from Israeli settlements, which is likely to have no financial impact on its intended target, has been a swift blow to interfaith relations here in Canada.

In response, the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) called for an immediate moratorium on dialogue and partnership activities between Jewish communal organizations and the United Church, pending a meeting of CIJA's board in mid-September.

There is precedent for such an action. In recent history, the Canadian Jewish Congress, one of the CIJA's predecessor organizations, suspended relations with both the United Church and the Anglican Church for two years. The current moratorium applies at all levels and to both bilateral and multifaceted activities at which the United Church is represented.

The crux of the matter has nothing to do with the settlements – on which there is a healthy diversity of opinion within Canadian Jewry. The real issue is a fundamental objection to the use of boycotts against Israelis and the United Church's shift from dialogue to coercion, which is nothing short of outrageous and immoral. On this point, there is immense unity within the Canadian Jewish community.

This moratorium is a temporary policy to create space for our community to reflect on the United Church's decision. CIJA is holding national consultations with synagogues, federation partners and grassroots Jewry to gain a greater understanding of the community's pulse on this issue.

We encourage you to get involved by sending a brief written submission (to ucc-action@cija.ca before Sept. 12) on behalf of yourself, your family or your community organization. Share your thoughts on how the Jewish community should structure its relationship with the United Church.

Should the moratorium on interactions with the United Church at all levels be maintained? Should it apply to all joint activities, or should some projects (such as a Holocaust education centre that wishes to partner with a United Church congregation) be exempt? Should simple conditions apply before entering into local partnerships? For example, if an individual United Church rejects the General Council's boycott, would that be sufficient for a synagogue to re-initiate local dialogue?

It is no exaggeration to say that our answers will carry broader significance, given that the United Church is the first prominent Canadian church to launch boycott measures against the Jewish state. We must therefore also ask: how does our long-term response to the United Church signal our concerns to other denominations, which may well be the next target of anti-Israel activists?

We consider these questions in recognition of the burden the United Church's General Council has imposed on its congregants and clergy, who now find their church co-opted by a broader, toxic anti-Israel movement. Heated responses in the media in recent weeks, most of which have been highly critical of the United Church, testify to the fury the boycott has provoked among Christians and Jews alike. Indeed, CIJA and its federation partners have received overwhelming support from Christians across Canada, both in the United Church and in other churches, who have, written or called to express their disgust with the boycott.

Holding national consultations with synagogues, federation partners and grassroots Jewry

This heartfelt response from our Christian neighbours is a demonstration of the fact that we have far more allies than detractors in churches across our country. Regardless of how the Jewish community proceeds vis-a-vis the United Church, now is the time for all of us – whether in national organizations, local federations, or synagogues – to renew and strengthen our relationships with Christians outside the United Church. For in this challenging time, those who have stepped forward from Catholic, evangelical and other Protestant churches have proven themselves men and women of integrity – and true friends to the Jewish People.

Kol Ami offers tuition-free school

Rabbi Micah Streiffer

Compiled by CJN Staff

Saturday morning school at Temple Kol Ami in Thornhill, Ont., will be tuition-free beginning this month for members with children in the early grades.

As well, the school will be open to non-members, up to Grade 2.

The changes are intended to make the religious school more available to the broader community, according to a news release from the temple.

"This is a bold experiment with a new approach to Jewish education," Rabbi Micah Streiffer, spiritual leader of the congregation, said. "We're convinced that there are families out there who are interested in a unique, family-centred approach to Jewish learning, but who just haven't made their way into a congregation yet."

Religious school classes are held at the same time as Shabbat morning services, and are built around family involvement in learning.

Last year, in a related experiment, the congregation reached out to unaffiliated families through a program called A Taste of Kol Ami.

Ludy Silver, the temple's new director of education, said that Kol Ami "is a congregation for the 21st century: diverse, family-oriented, with an approach to learning that looks very different from the traditional classroom environment that many of us remember."

FLASHPOINT: Mark Ellis and Stephanie Morgenstern, the executive producers of the CTV police drama Flashpoint, were seen at the Fan Expo at the Metro Toronto Convention Centre last month.

מאה שנה ליונייטד בייקרי (United Bakery):

ואי אפשר גם בלי סרט אחד:

רוצו לראות את People Like Us שמספר את עלילותיו של בחור צעיר שחי כמו חזיר, עד שיום אחד, אחרי מות אביו, הוא מגלה את כל מה שלא ידע על חייו. אם אתם ישראלים - הסרט הזה ירגש אתכם מאוד.
אבל שישאר בינינו.

Dr. Greenberg retires after 60 years

"And that encapsulates my entire philosophy," he added.

Greenberg and his wife, Pepi (Rosenstein), have four children: David, who has practised medicine with his father; Sara Zagdanski, a community volunteer; Aaron, vice-president of Strategic Merchandising for Genumark Promotional Merchandise, and Amy Strauch, a social worker.

He says that he has never forgotten his early days. His father was a Hebrew teacher who was weakened by tuberculosis. He became a shochet.

"I brought the chickens in a bushel in a baby carriage to my father who ritually slaughtered them, and my mother stood beside him and flicked them. They got five cents for every chicken," he recalled.

"I delivered papers that cost two cents and increased to three cents in 1938."

He attended Central High School of Commerce and quit when he was 15 to help his family. After serving in the air force, he went back to school. At 23, he obtained his senior matriculation in five months before entering the University of Toronto medical school, from which he graduated in 1952.

He says that his devotion to the Jewish People stems from his parents, Aaron and Sima Greenberg, who despite their hardships and tragedies, passed on optimism, caring and fair play to their children.

It is the Ruishe shul, Congregation Shaarei Tzedec on Markham Avenue, and Ulster Street, which ties him to his youth.

"I remember going there with my father, and I wanted the shul to survive because I cherish the memories of the old times."

In 1967, he personally assumed the responsibility for restoring the synagogue that was in disrepair and on the verge of bankruptcy. Throughout the years, he has continued to maintain the building and its activities.

"I am grateful that my son, David, continues our family tradition and has assumed a major role in the synagogue's survival," Greenberg said.

The soft spoken and gentle doctor was named the City's Best Doctor by Toronto Life magazine and received the Ontario Medical Association's Glen Sawyer Service Award for distinguished service to the medical profession and the community.

For many years, he was a consultant to the Ontario Boxing Commission and has been the ringside doctor for George Chuvalo, Clyde Gray and other boxers. Greenberg has been inducted into the International Boxing Hall of Fame.

Dr. Joseph (Joe) Greenberg at 18 in the Canadian Air Force

Dr. Sandy Buchman, in his inaugural speech as president of the College of Family Physicians of Canada, expressed his appreciation to Greenberg.

"Dr. Joseph Greenberg or Dr. Joe, as most of us know him, [is] a country doctor in the city, a family doctor whom I knew as a child, who made house calls to my grandmother and just about everybody else in town, my inspiration for a career in family medicine."

"My heartfelt gratitude for all that you do and for showing me the way. You helped me make a very good choice in life."

Greenberg's daughter, Sara, told The C/JN, "Medicine was not only a profession for my father, it was truly his calling – it's not simply what he became, it's who he is."

In acknowledgement of his milestone 60 years in the medical field, the Greenberg family is inviting his friends, patients and colleagues to submit stories, memories and photos, which will be compiled into a book for Dr. Joe.

Please send them to djroesretirement@gmail.com or to Dr. Joe's Retirement, 618 Bathurst St., Toronto, Ont., M5S 2P8.

Holiday Food Ideas

Menu balances sweet with savoury, sweet with tart

Daphna Rabinovitch
Special to The CJN

I am certainly not one to pass up an opportunity to entertain, so I look forward to the many holidays that dot the Jewish calendar each year.

Rosh Hashanah especially is a favourite since it speaks to my love of pairing sweet with savoury. Perhaps this is a result of my mixed Russian-Ukrainian-Litvak heritage combined with an upbringing in Montreal, a city that loves its meats flavoured or served with something sweet.

HERB ROASTED CHICKEN ON QUINOA WITH CRANBERRIES, APPLES AND SUNFLOWER SEEDS

This recipe doubles beautifully; so if you're having a crowd, simply make two chickens. Rinsing the quinoa first removes any nascent bitterness it may have.

2 tbsp. finely chopped fresh sage
2 tbsp. finely chopped fresh parsley
1 tbsp. each finely chopped fresh rosemary and thyme
4 large cloves garlic, minced
1 tbsp. finely grated lemon rind
1 ½ tsp. salt and pepper
1 ¼ cup olive oil

1 lemon, cut in half
2 tbsp. balsamic vinegar
1 large chicken, (around 4 lb.), trussed
1-1/2 cups quinoa
2 tbsp. olive oil
1 large onion, chopped
1/3 cup dried cranberries
1/3 cup chopped dried apples
1/4 cup unsalted hulled sunflower seeds
2-1/4 cups low sodium chicken broth
1/2 tsp. each salt and pepper

Preheat oven to 325. In a small bowl, combine chopped sage, parsley, rosemary, thyme, garlic, lemon zest, salt, pepper and oil. Using your fingers, create a pocket between chicken skin and meat, without removing the skin. Rub herb mixture under skin, massaging into meat over legs, thighs and breasts to evenly distribute. Massage any herbs and oil left on your hands onto surface of chicken. Place lemon halves in cavity. Brush vinegar over top and sides of chicken. Place chicken, breast side up, on rack set inside roasting pan. Roast in centre of preheated oven, basting, occasionally, for 2 to 2-1/4 hours or until juices run clear when chicken is pierced and meat thermometer inserted in thigh registers 185F.

Meanwhile, rinse quinoa in fine mesh sieve; drain well. Heat oil in large saucepan set over medium heat. Add onion; cook, stirring, for three minutes or until softened. Stir in cranberries, apples, sunflower seeds and drained quinoa, mixing well. Pour in stock, salt and pepper. Bring to a boil; reduce heat and simmer, partially covered, for about 20 minutes or until quinoa is fluffy and tender. Remove from heat. Let stand at room temperature, covered.

Let chicken rest for 10 minutes. Carve into 6 pieces. Place about 3/4 cup of quinoa on plate. Top with chicken piece. Pour any juices from pan over chicken. Makes 6 servings.

GREEN BEANS WITH SMOKED PAPRIKA AND ALMONDS

Smoked paprika can be found in most specialty stores. It comes in both sweet and hot versions. I've called for the sweet version here, but if you know your guests prefer hot and spicy, feel free to substitute the hotter variety.

1-1/2 tbsp. olive oil
1 lb. trimmed green beans

3 cloves garlic, minced
1/4 tsp. sweet smoked paprika
2 tbsp. honey
1/2 cup blanched whole almonds, toasted

Heat oil in large non-stick skillet set over medium heat. Add green beans, garlic and paprika and cook, stirring, for 3 minutes or just until green beans start to turn golden. Add 3/4 cup water. Bring to boil, cover and cook for 5 minutes or until bright green and tender. Stir in honey and almonds. Cook, stirring for 2 minutes. Season to taste with salt and pepper. Makes 4 to 6 servings.

APPLE AND RASPBERRY PHYLLO TURNOVERS

These turnovers can rest in the refrigerator unbaked until your guests have started either their soup or their main course. Then simply pop them into the oven so they're toasty warm for dessert.

2 Golden Delicious apples, peeled, cored and thinly sliced
1/3 cup packed light brown sugar
1 tsp. cornstarch
1/4 tsp. each cinnamon and nutmeg
1 cup fresh raspberries
6 sheets phyllo dough
3 tbsp. canola oil
2 tsp. maple syrup

Preheat oven to 375. In a large bowl, toss together apples, brown sugar, cornstarch, cinnamon and nutmeg. Gently stir in raspberries. In small bowl, stir together oil and maple syrup.

Keeping remainder covered with damp towel to prevent drying out, place 1 sheet of the phyllo on work surface. Brush all over with oil mixture. Place second sheet of phyllo directly on top. Brush all over with oil mixture. Place third sheet of phyllo on top. Brush all over with oil mixture. Cut lengthwise into three equal sized wide strips.

Place one-sixth of apple filling about 1/2 inch (1 cm) from 1 short edge of each strip. Fold short edge over filling to meet long edge and form triangle; fold triangle up. Continue folding sideways and upward to end of strip; press flap to seal. Brush each turnover with oil mixture. Place on parchment paper-lined cookie sheet.

Working quickly, repeat with remaining phyllo, oil mixture and apple filling.

Bake in centre of preheated oven for about 20 minutes or until turnovers are golden brown. Makes 6 servings.

Fruit in your main course, veggies in dessert?

Randy Fingrut
Special to The CJN

Rosh Hashanah, which marks the season of harvest, is an excellent opportunity to introduce a wealth of fruit and vegetables into your festive cooking and baking.

The result can be a new twist on old classics, revving up the good-for-you factor. It's also a great way to disguise vegetables or jazz up a main course with the addition of fruit. These changes will encourage kids, teens and adults alike to eat their daily fruit and vegetable servings. Consequently, this change in a holiday menu will provide vitamins, minerals and fibre, and help to reduce fat intake.

Think about incorporating vegetables into not only appetizers and main courses, but also baked goods such as cakes, cookies, breads and muffins. Consider carrots, zucchini, olives, onions, cooked pumpkin, beets, squash and/or baked sweet potatoes.

Just remember that cooking is an art, but baking is a science. It requires careful formulas and precise measurements. Look for recipes that are tried and true, using your choice of vegetables and other healthy ingredients. Search for recipes that also use less fat.

In most baking, vegetable purees such as sweet potato puree can replace one-half of the fat in a recipe without any problem. The addition of vegetable purees in baking also helps to keep baked goods fresh and moist. When searching for new baking recipes, look for different flavour combinations.

Varying the spices in a recipe will not change the formula for that recipe. For example, substitute cinnamon for ginger, nutmeg or allspice for anise or vanilla. Also consider adding dried fruits, nuts, citrus zest, poppy or sesame seeds to your cooking and baking for an extra boost of flavour and nutrition. Don't be afraid to experiment. We all remember when mom told us, "No dessert until you eat your vegetables." Now the vegetables can be your dessert, and the fruit your main course!

SWEET AND SPICY FRUIT-STUFFED BRISKET

- 1 (4-lb.) single brisket, all visible fat removed
- 2 tbsp. brown sugar
- 1/2 cup each of raisins, dried cranberries and chopped dried apricots
- 1/2 cup Mutzu (Crispin) apple, peeled and diced
- 1 tsp. dried rosemary
- 1 tsp. hot chili sauce
- 1-1/2 tsp. kosher salt
- 1-1/2 tsp. ground pepper
- kitchen string or 4 wood skewers, soaked in hot water for one hour
- 2 tsp. canola oil

In a saucepan, boil one cup of water and reduce to a simmer. Add raisins, cranberries, dried apricots, apples, rosemary and hot chili sauce and cook until soft, about two minutes. Cool.

Cover brisket with parchment paper, and using a meat mallet or a rolling pin, flatten to about 1-inch thickness. Season with 1 tsp. kosher salt and 1 tsp. ground pepper.

Spoon fruit mixture over brisket, leaving a 1-inch border around the edge. Roll up brisket lengthwise, jelly roll fashion, and tie with string at 2-inch intervals, or secure with the wood skewers. Trim with scissors if necessary. Season the brisket with the remaining salt and pepper. Preheat oven to 375.

Heat oil in large frying pan to medium-high. Brown rolled brisket about 2 to 3 minutes on each side. Place brisket, seam side down, in a greased Dutch oven. Cover and bake for 1 hour. Reduce oven temperature to 300. Uncover the pan and baste brisket. Replace the lid and bake the brisket for approximately 2 hours longer, or until the brisket is very tender.

Continue basting the brisket throughout the remaining baking time. Remove brisket from the Dutch oven and set aside, lightly covered with foil, to rest for 15 to 20 minutes before serving. (Brisket will carve more easily when cooled.)

SCALLOPED STYLE SWEET POTATOES

4 large sweet potatoes
3-4 large apples, peeled and cored
1 pepper squash
1/2 tsp. salt
4 tbsp. honey
2 tbsp. canola oil
4 tbsp. orange marmalade
3/4 cup water
1/4 cup dry sherry zest of one lemon juice of one lemon
canola oil to grease Pyrex baking dishes

Peel and slice the sweet potatoes and the squash, place slices on their sides in greased Pyrex baking dishes and bake in a 350-degree oven for one hour or until soft. Slice apples. Stand baked sweet potato slices, baked squash slices and apple slices, alternating colours, in a greased Pyrex baking dish. Mix together the remaining ingredients and pour evenly over the top of the layered potato mixture. Bake at 350 for 40-60 minutes, or until apples are soft.

HONEY BAKED BEANS

The jury is still out on whether beans are a vegetable or a fruit. We do know that beans are legumes, edible seeds, which are fat free, sodium free, high in fibre, protein and iron. Use beans often in your appetizers, meat and meatless entrees and side dishes.

1-3/4 cups dried navy beans
1 large cooking onion, diced
2 oz. canola oil
1/2 cup honey
2 tsp. salt
1 tbsp. prepared yellow mustard
1/2 cup ketchup

Soak beans overnight, rinse. In a large saucepan, cover beans with cold water and cook on medium heat for 1-1/2 hours, or until beans are soft. Drain beans and leave them in the saucepan. Sauté the onions in the canola oil until soft. Combine the onions, honey, salt, mustard and ketchup and stir mixture into the beans. Transfer coated beans to a lightly greased Pyrex baking dish and bake in a 350-degree oven for one hour. Beans should appear glazed, and slightly browned around the edges.

CONFETTI HONEY CAKE

1-1/2 cups shredded carrots
1-1/2 cups shredded zucchini
1 cup shredded apple
4 eggs, beaten
1-1/2 cups honey
1 cup canola oil
2 tsp. ginger, freshly grated
3 cups all purpose flour
1 tsp. baking soda
1 tsp. baking powder
1/2 tsp. salt
1 cup raisins
1 cup sliced almonds

Line the bottom of three loaf pans with a strip of parchment paper the width of the bottom of the pan and the length of the pan. Lightly spray pans with canola oil.

In food processor combine the eggs, honey, oil and ginger. Add flour, baking soda, baking powder and salt. Process just until combined with the wet ingredients. Fold in the carrots, zucchini, apple, raisins and three-quarters of the sliced almonds.

Divide the batter into the three loaf pans. Sprinkle with remaining sliced almonds. Bake at 350 for 60 minutes, or until a toothpick inserted into the cake comes out clean.

Healthy homemade sweets to start the year

Jody Bart Kancigor
Special to The CJN

Jewish food and healthy cooking. Two expressions you don't expect to see in the same sentence, right?

Not anymore. Today's kosher cooks are just as health-conscious as everyone else, and The Whole Foods Kosher Kitchen by Lévana Kirschenbaum proves that preparing flavourful, nutritious, healthful meals doesn't have to be time-consuming or costly.

"Cooking from scratch wins the race," she told me by phone from her New York City home. "The greatest effort is when you work so hard trying not to do it. I see people standing in line for 20 minutes waiting to buy coffee and a muffin. Come back home. You could have made a pot full of coffee and a dozen muffins in that 20 minutes. And they do it every morning."

Born in Morocco, Kirschenbaum studied in France and came to the United States at the age of 24. For over 30 years her bakery, restaurant, catering business and cooking classes have attracted a loyal following, and no wonder. Her recipes reflect the exotic and naturally healthful cuisine of her homeland and the international influences of her travels: Chicken Curry with Tomatoes and Plantains, Artichoke and Lima Bean Tajine, Moroccan Chicken Pie. Even the old favorites get a healthy update: Cholent with spelt berries; Apple Noodle Kugel with yogurt and real maple syrup; a quinoa variation on kasha.

"I want people to have their favourites, only recast in a natural way," she said. "You don't have time to make stuffed cabbage but you love the flavour, so make it unstuffed. It's a nice way to save time and not buy a microwave meal."

For those who think "organic" is synonymous with "healthy," Kirschenbaum has a caveat. Yes, she's all for buying organic when it comes to the "dirty dozen," twelve fruits and vegetables highest in pesticide residues: celery, peaches, strawberries, apples, blueberries, nectarines, bell peppers, spinach, cherries, kale/collard greens, potatoes and imported grapes. But she's almost fanatical in her emphasis on unprocessed ingredients.

"The organic industry knows how to make a junk meal," she explained. "That's why you have the organic microwavable TV dinner. Who needs it? Instead of 'organic,' the buzz word should be 'unprocessed.'"

Unprocessed food, she said, is no more expensive and surprisingly takes less time to prepare than its processed counterpart. "In the time it takes to microwave six individual dinners I can make six fillets of fish and still

"I have the greatest respect for my mother," she told me. "[Chef and cooking show host] Lidia Bastianich always says that she works with very poor ingredients, because this is the training she had at home. Her family was grindingly poor, like we were, but the food was fabulous. There must be something to it, since they used the most modest, unprocessed ingredients and the result was so great. All the food that God created was good. Things went downhill when you started processing, refining and bleaching food."

Kirschenbaum is passionate about desserts and tackles the challenge of creating healthier, more flavourful showstoppers without guilt. "Why not enjoy the real thing in moderation?" she writes.

"If you do not eat anything processed, you have room for dessert," she said. "I use whole grains and unprocessed sweeteners, which more than mitigates the fact that I'm having dessert."

For Rosh Hashanah dessert, we think first of honey cake, signifying our wish for a sweet New Year. Kirschenbaum's is moist and spicy infused with orange marmalade. "I trust it will make you forget all the indignities of past dried out and brittle honey cakes," she writes. For those that do not eat nuts during the holiday, they may be omitted.

But why serve honey only in honey cake? Honey-Roasted Bananas with Coconut Sorbet is a delightful take on our iconic holiday symbol, best served warm. Or indulge in Amlou, a Moroccan-style honey almond jelly that Kirschenbaum fondly recalls eating with peanut butter, her favourite childhood snack. "The original spread is made with Argan oil, an insanely expensive and insanely delicious oil from a tree growing only in Morocco," she writes. Olive oil makes a fine substitution. "Talk about healthy – a nutritional powerhouse." And what a great hostess gift for the holidays, too.

HONEY CAKE

- 1 cup oil
- 2/3 cup sugar
- 1 cup dark honey (if not available, substitute regular honey and use brown sugar instead of white)
- 1 cup orange marmalade, preferably all-fruit
- 4 large eggs
- 3/4 cup strong coffee, at room temperature
- 3 tbsp. rum or brandy
- 3 cups flour: all-purpose, whole wheat pastry, or spelt
- 2 tsp. baking powder
- 1 tsp. baking soda
- pinch salt
- 1 tsp. each cinnamon, allspice and ginger
- 1/2 cup sliced almonds (optional)

Preheat oven to 350. Grease tube pan or 10-in. or 11x14-in. pan.

Mix oil, sugar, honey, marmalade, eggs, coffee and rum in a food processor.

Mix dry ingredients in a bowl, and add in 3 additions to the wet ingredients, using the pulse button, mixing each time only until combined.

Pour batter into prepared pan. Sprinkle almonds evenly over the top, if using. Bake until a knife inserted in the centre comes out clean, about 1 hour (may be longer, depending on pan used). Invert onto a rack to cool. Yield: 12 generous servings.

HONEY ROASTED BANANAS & COCONUT SORBET

6 medium-ripe bananas, or ripe plantains, split lengthwise

- 1/3 cup honey, maple syrup or agave nectar
- 2 tbsp. vegetable oil
- 2 tbsp. grated fresh ginger
- 2 tbsp. rum
- Juice and zest of 1 lemon
- 1/2 cup unsweetened grated coconut, packed
- coconut sorbet, for garnish
- chopped toasted nuts, or granola, for sprinkling (optional)

Preheat oven to 400. Place banana halves tightly side by side in baking pan just large enough to fit them all in one layer.

Mix all remaining ingredients thoroughly in bowl, and pour mixture evenly over bananas. Roast 15 minutes.

Serve warm with a scoop of coconut sorbet. Sprinkle with nuts or granola, if desired.

HONEY ALMOND SPREAD (AMLLOU)

- 2 cups toasted whole unpeeled almonds (about 15 minutes in preheated 325 oven)
- 2/3 cup extra-virgin olive oil
- 2/3 cup dark honey
- 1/2 tsp. salt

Process all ingredients until smooth. Yield: about 2 cups. Store refrigerated in a glass jar.

Pomegranates are delicious, not just decorative

Sue Epstein
Special to The CJN

For many Jews, pomegranates are permanently associated with Rosh Hashanah. We may even eat a few seeds as one of the simanim (symbolic foods) on the holiday itself. But not many people realize how many recipes they can be used in and what a "super-fruit" they are. Not only are pomegranates an extremely dense source of nutrients, they also contain cancer- and heart disease-fighting antioxidants, and they're delicious. Plus, a bowl of pomegranates makes a beautiful holiday centrepiece.

To select a ripe pomegranate, choose one that is heavy, slightly square in shape (unripe pomegranates are very round), with dark red skin. Another sign of ripeness is when the petals of the crown turn in towards the centre. They will keep for several months in the refrigerator, but are best eaten soon after purchasing.

When pomegranates are in season, I always keep a small container of the arils (seeds) in my refrigerator to sprinkle over salads. It gives a nice zing to your salad and adds pretty colour.

BARLEY AND WILD RICE PILAF WITH POMEGRANATE SEEDS

2 tsp. olive oil
1 medium onion, finely chopped
1/2 cup wild rice, rinsed
1/2 cup pearl barley
3 cups chicken or vegetable broth

1/3 cup pine nuts
seeds of 1 large pomegranate (about 1 cup)
2 tsp. freshly grated lemon zest
2 tbsp. chopped fresh parsley

Heat oil in a large saucepan over medium heat. Add onion and cook, stirring often, until softened. Add wild rice and barley; stir for a few seconds. Add broth and bring to a simmer. Reduce heat to low, cover and simmer until the wild rice and barley are tender and most of the liquid has been absorbed, 45 to 50 minutes.

End your holiday meal with fruit

Meanwhile, toast pine nuts in a small, dry skillet over medium-low heat, stirring constantly, until light golden and fragrant, 2 to 3 minutes. Transfer to a small bowl to cool.

Add pomegranate seeds, lemon zest, parsley and toasted pine nuts to the cooked pilaf; fluff with a fork. Serve hot. Yield: 6 servings.

ROASTED BOSCH PEARS WITH POMEGRANATE GLAZE

This makes a lovely, light dessert after a heavy holiday or Shabbat meal. Bosch pears are distinguished by russet skins and elegantly elongated necks and stems. They are an ideal dessert pear because they hold their shape when roasted or poached. Pomegranate juice is available in most grocery stores.

- 3 1/4 cup dry red wine, such as Zinfandel
- 3 1/4 cup pomegranate juice
- 1/2 cup sugar
- 1 cinnamon stick
- 2 tsp. grated orange peel
- 6 Bosch pears with stems, peeled

Preheat oven to 350. Stir wine, pomegranate juice, sugar, cinnamon stick, and orange peel in medium saucepan over medium heat until sugar dissolves, about 3 minutes.

Using small melon baller, core pears from bottom of wide end. Trim bottoms flat and stand upright in 8x8x2-in. baking dish. Pour pomegranate-wine sauce over pears. Roast pears until tender when pierced with knife, basting pears with sauce every 20 minutes, about 1 hour.

Using spatula, transfer roasted pears to serving platter. If pan juices are very liquid, transfer to a small saucepan and simmer until reduced to 2/3 cup, about 5 minutes. (Can be made 4 hours ahead. Let sauce and pears stand at room temperature. You can re-warm sauce before continuing.) Spoon glaze over pears. Serve warm, or at room temperature. Yield: 6 servings.

APPLE-POMEGRANATE CRUMBLE

- 2 cups pomegranate seeds
- 2 medium apples, cored and thinly sliced
- 1/4 cup sugar
- 2 tbsp. flour
- juice and zest of 1 lemon
- 1 tsp. cinnamon
- 1/4 cup flour
- 3/4 cup old fashioned oatmeal (not quick-cook)
- 4 tbsp. margarine
- pinch salt

Preheat oven to 350. Place pomegranate seeds, apples, sugar, flour, lemon juice and zest and cinnamon in a large bowl and toss to coat.

Arrange coated fruit in an 8-in. baking dish. Pulse flour, oatmeal, margarine and salt in food processor until a crumbly mixture forms. Sprinkle this mixture over the fruit. Spray crumbly topping with a thin layer of cooking spray. Bake 25 to 30 minutes or until topping is firm and edges are bubbly. Cool completely before storing. Can be refrigerated for three days. Yield: 6 servings.

A hidden treasure in an urban oasis

Spa Life

By KATHRYN KATES

When you think of going to a quaint historic inn with a luxurious spa facility, the city of Mississauga may not come to mind—but it should. The Glenerin Inn and The Spa at the Glenerin Inn is a hidden treasure more than ready to be found.

The Glenerin Inn, in the heart of the picturesque Credit River Valley, was built in 1927 by a lawyer to be used as his summer home. Over the years, the property has housed a girls' school, a rest home for employees from the Robert Simpson Company, an event space and – surprisingly – a synagogue. In the early 1970s, while their synagogue was being built, Mississauga's Solel congregation flocked to The Glenerin.

In 1986, after an extensive restoration and renovation, The Glenerin Inn opened its doors as a resort and just last December added the spa.

The Spa at the Glenerin Inn is all about creating the ultimate, memorable experience for our clients. "Our goal is to provide you the best day spa experience implementing the 'wow' factor in everything we do," says Audrey Hlembizky, a director and co-owner of The Spa at the Glenerin Inn.

The rustic earth tone spa with red and gold décor accents is designed with exotic Asian influences – Chinese, Japanese and East Indian – which creates a Zen-like environment that Hlembizky, who is a highly-trained esthetician, makeup artist, hairstylist and reiki master, says caters to the mind/body balance.

"We have five treatment rooms. The great thing about our treatment rooms is that you don't feel like you are in this tiny little space, we made them large, so each one of them we can offer couple's treatments in them. We have a three registered massage therapists and four certified estheticians, plus the spa director and three owners," informs Hlembizky, a business woman, who herself is a highly trained esthetician/makeup artist, hairstylist and reiki master.

Their clients – which is mostly made up of women – is split evenly between hotel guests and locals.

"Massage is our most popular treatment. The great thing about our massage treatments are that we like it to feel like a spa experience not like your weekly massage at your chiropractor's office, so we bring in the aromatherapy smells, the candles, the music and the comfortable bedding," she says.

"We start all our massages with what we like to call the 'welcome treatment.' Once they are on the bed and covered with a blanket we give the entire body a little bit of tender loving care by caressing your body from your head to your feet. It helps you to really decompress, distress and relax before we get right into the work. We finish the massage with the same way.

The Spa at the Glenerin Inn offers a unique collection of holistic and wellness spa therapies based on healing cultural arts from around the world.

"We are very well-known for our skin care treatments including our Vitamin C Skin Therapy, Collagen Therapy and our organic facials," says Hlembizky.

Services include an array of massages including Hot Stone, Aromatherapy, Deep Tissue, Spiritual Tranquility and Harmony, a holistic therapeutic treatment that combines Hot Stone therapy, Aromatherapy and Swedish massage especially nice as a couple's romance experience.

Also on offer are body treatments such as the Body Facial, Body Polish and the Warm Lavender Escape to name a few, and a variety of facial treatments, hand and foot care, and bridal hair and makeup.

The Spa boasts its their own skin care line using raw natural materials such as clays, essential oils and floral waters, so that their products are both very fresh and active. They also use the organic product line Seaflora from British Columbia.

A number of packages with The Glen Erin Inn are offered including the very popular Romance Package which includes an overnight stay, breakfast and a 30 minute massage for two.

The Glen Erin Inn has 30 newly decorated guest rooms and suites complete with old world charm and modern day comforts such as Internet access and large flat screen TVs. The inn is surrounded by a beautifully manicured lawn and a hiking trail cascading through a ravine in the back.

Several of the guest rooms have fireplaces with stone accent walls that mirror the exterior of the inn. Close by are premier golf courses, fishing, shopping and cultural attractions. The attentive staff will be more than happy to assist you in planning.

The Glen Erin Inn plays host to a number of weddings and conferences. Kosher meals for functions can be brought in with advance notice.

Are watches becoming obsolete?

Anita Szabadi-Gottesman
Special to The CJN

For generations, the wristwatch and the classic pocket watch were not only essential for telling time, they were treasured family heirlooms often passed down as keepsakes, or to mark special occasions.

Today, alas, the ubiquitous wristwatch is fighting for its rightful place on the wrist.

Find any location where youths gather – from the university library to the local coffee shop – and take a minute (use your watch if you wear one) to look around and you will see that many, if not most, are not sporting a watch and cannot be observed periodically glancing at their wrists to check the time.

Cellphones, laptops, iPads and any other computer related device (too numerous to mention) show the time on a 24-hour clock. No need for young backpackers to note the time change as they travel or to check today's date. Whatever is not immediately available at the touch of a keypad, well, there is an app for that!

Wearing a watch today clearly makes a statement. Industry insiders describe this ever-burgeoning phenomenon as wearing a watch with "wrist presence."

Michelle Graff, writer for National Jeweler Magazine, the jewelry trades go to guide for news and trends in the retail jewelry business concurs. "Meaning is important in a time when an ever-growing number of gadgets -think mobile phone, tablet computers and iPods threaten to make the wristwatch obsolete."

For both men and women watches

larger watch while still paying attention to the "watch to wrist ratio" and select a watch that does not completely overpower the wearer by its size or girth.

The classic thin small-faced watch has seemingly gone by the wayside over the last two years in fashion being replaced by larger and larger faced watches that clearly make a statement.

Big, bold and brassy, these watches have both form and function. While uber shiny stainless steel faces and watch bands have stolen the show over the past several seasons, 2012 sees a return to the more classic yellow gold (real and imitation) along with two-tone (silver and gold) and a triumphant return of the softer hues of rose gold.

National Jeweler also reports that stainless steel is adding a touch of colour in greens, purples and even this seasons' blockbuster colour orange. For the more conservative wearer still wanting to add a pop of colour, the more subdued shades of charcoal, brown and black are also paired with stainless.

Women's Wear Daily reports on bright watches making a splash on the runway in several colours including turquoise.

have taken on a brawny look with thicker watches and wider straps. The trend has spread to all categories of watches from those with sub-dials, tachometers, chronographs and dual times and the simplest of watches with no other functions than just the ability to watch the passage of time.

While bigger may seem better across all categories, from those found at big box stores to the exclusive lines of Breitling, Patek Philippe and Cartier, dealer, collector and author of American Wristwatches: Five Decades of Style and Design, Edward Faber, cautions the wearer to choose a

Hair trending techniques for students – and moms

Prepare for the busy mornings of autumn by keeping your hair strong with a good cut and moisturizing conditioners — and aim for effortless styling with modern tools and innovation, say specialists in this field.

A popular back-to-school resource for ideas online is www.conaircanada.ca, which, in addition to a full lineup of stylers for any hair type, is also featuring the hottest trends with tips and tutorials, like this:

Loose vertical curls: For fast and fabulous styling, use a conical curling wand. It will give you textured curls with no kinks. You simply wrap each strand around the wand, hold it and release. Called the You Curl, this specialized iron heats up in 30 seconds for quick styling on the go. It's made with a ceramic material to give your hair more protection while it eliminates static and reduces frizz. Easy quick-tip techniques are on the website.

Soft crimped tresses: Runway models and celebrities are wearing their hair in a unique, crimped wave design. It is soft and textured, but it's also "beachy" since it's a look you might get after a few hours in the sea breezes on the beach. When you only have five minutes though, a ceramic styler called You Wave Ultra is a "must have" hair appliance to help you pull it off every time. Tutorials are available online.

When assessing the right look for you, consider this: If you want big, bouncy tresses, use a curling iron with a very wide diameter. For tighter curls, use one that is narrower. Here are a few more Conair tips for creating the look you want:

Big Curls

The size used to create large curls is usually three-quarters to one inch in diameter (2 to 3 cm). TIP: Spritz small sections with mousse, then wrap them around the iron and hold for five seconds. Release, let hair cool, then use fingers to separate curls.

Tight Curls

Use a narrow iron that is one-half inch (13 mm) in diameter producing a ringlet effect. TIP: Wrap small sections from ends to roots in a spiral. Hold five seconds. Release curl, let it cool, spritz with hairspray but do not touch.

Big Waves

A curling iron that is 1.5 inches (4 cm) in diameter will create large, loose waves in longer hair, or help smooth short hair. TIP: Wrap large sections around the iron to smooth; wrap small sections to create waves. The longer you hold the curling iron in the hair the tighter the result.

Slight Waves

A curling iron about 1 to 1.5 inches (3 cm) in diameter will create nice, soft waves. TIP: Curl small sections of hair with the curling iron, then clip each section to head. When cool, release pins and run fingers through hair.

Israel bans skinny models

Jessica Steinberg
The Times of Israel

It took fashion photographer Adi Barkan nearly 10 years to pass his so-called Photoshop law — the recent Knesset legislation requiring a minimum weight for models according to the standard Body Mass Index and the regulation of Photoshop use in advertising.

"I'm looking at the next generation of models, the next Linda Evangelistas," said Barkan. "We're starting with the young models and in four to five years we'll see a new model of models."

Barkan began his campaign against underweight models and the prevalence of anorexia and bulimia in the Israeli modeling industry after his friend, former model Hila Elmalich, died from bulimia.

He worked with young models, tried to convince modeling agencies and clothing companies to stop Photoshopping their advertisements, and eventually began working on legislation with several Knesset members.

The new law, passed last March, goes into effect in Israel on January 1, 2013. That gives models, agencies and the companies that use models nearly 10 months to get themselves ready for the new era, said Barkan, as some models will need to gain weight in order to meet the BMI standards. At that point, if companies hire underweight models or use improper Photoshopping to touch up pictures, they can be sued by the model, "for being influenced to lose weight," and fined "anywhere from thousands to millions of shekels," said Barkan.

Bringing online brokers into the 21st century

Karin Kloosterman
Israel21c

The ups and downs of the stock market look random and chaotic from the outside, but some brokers do make a lot of money for themselves and their clients.

Are they lucky or are they just good at risky business? A new Israeli company is working to give you and your portfolio the answer.

CPattern is a new analytics technology that helps brokers and traders make better stock-market trading decisions. It collects information on the buying and selling behaviour of traders worldwide to analyze what works and what doesn't. The multilingual solution is tailored to suit online brokers, who can then alert and advise home traders looking to invest in the global stock market.

"We are taking online brokers from the Stone Age to the 21st century," said Oded Shefer, the CEO and co-founder of CPattern. "We give online brokers and home traders high-resolution data when they need it."

Why share a technology to crack the stock market? "We did not develop a machine that prints money. We analyze the decision-making and the activity of traders with relation to dynamic market conditions in real time," Shefer said.

While the technology can't predict the future, he said that it can help people make better trades. Are you on a winning streak with six of your 10 companies, but a loser overall with the other four companies not performing well? If this is the case, one of CPattern's solutions can send you an alert about what's happening to your portfolio as a wakeup call. On the other hand, it congratulates you when you've made a good trade.

"We can find systematic errors and systematic decision-making which is positive and which brings better results. This allows traders to improve their performance and online brokers to improve their retention and conversion rates," Shefer said.

The solution is currently used by online brokers and marketing consultants such as Boston Technologies, AVA FX, yourtrade FX, etoro, Leverate and a handful of others.

Down the road, CPattern plans to develop solutions for traditional brokerage houses as well. If the price is right, the company can also help large firms detect illegal or suspicious trading from within the firm. This could reduce public scandals and market manipulation.

"It's a kind of sanity check," Shefer said. "Trading is very difficult, and sometimes traders find it hard to come up with the right reason for their success or failure. Sometimes they say it's the market or they blame themselves, or say it's pure luck or random. We can give traders a sanity check to show them the hidden patterns of their own behaviour."

Founded in 2009, CPattern now seeks less than $5 million for continued business development. Based in the Tel Aviv area, the company employs five full-time staff, and works with a small team of consultants to grow the technology.

The company links to buy-and-sell data of traders worldwide. The system clocks behaviour in real time without giving away the identity of the trader. No other company has been able to analyze in this way until now.

It wasn't easy. "The market is very complex, and it is influenced by many endless factors and variables. We measure a large list of variables for each particular trader and can make good profiles of his activity and understand what he does right and wrong in terms of profits and losses, and how he understands the market, and then we are mapping these differences," Shefer said.

It took Shefer's strong background in behavioural psychology to make the idea stick, since much of the stock market is based on fear-and-follow principles. This, matched with a mathematical co-founder, provided the winning formula for CPattern's smart algorithms, which can be tweaked on demand by companies.

The solution can simply provide reports and records of other traders' behaviour, but it can also be tailored to help you build your own portfolio. The information is currently being sold to trade consultants to give to their clients. Information can be customized to online brokers to give to their home-trader clients – people who often operate in a bubble, sometimes playing the market with risky bets that put a lot at stake.

"We've made research on the effects. Traders who use it on a regular basis make more trades and stay longer in the trading process. We don't know whether or not they are making more money, but they are trading more responsibly and have given us very good ratings," Shefer said.

Battery exchange for electric cars

JNS.org

The American-Israeli green technology startup Better Place Inc. is set to unveil its latest battery exchange station at Kibbutz Eilat near the southern Israeli city of Eilat, according to Globes.

Started in 2007, Better Place was the vision of Israeli entrepreneur Shai Agassi. It seeks to increase the global use of electric cars by constructing battery exchange networks to enable drivers to overcome limitations in the battery life of electric cars. In less than five minutes, a vehicle can have its battery swapped out for a fully recharged one.

In 2009, Better Place partnered with carmaker Renault-Nissan to construct the electric cars. Better Place chose Israel and Denmark to be its first customers due to their small sizes and high fuel prices.

The completion of the station near Eilat will now enable Israeli electric car drivers to travel anywhere in the country. "This is a milestone for the company, and especially for our first customers, who were partners in the vision," said Better Place CEO Moshe Kaplinsky.

Circumcision complaint against rabbi dropped

ITA

BERLIN — Prosecutors in Berlin dismissed a criminal complaint lodged against a rabbi for performing circumcisions.

The Jerusalem Post reported on Aug. 30 that the complaint for "causing bodily harm" against Rabbi Yitshak Ehrenberg was dropped Aug. 15 as "unfounded."

An opponent of circumcision lodged the complaint last month after Ehrenberg defended the practice on a television talk show.

The charge against Ehrenberg was the second time a rabbi in Germany was accused of the practice.

The two complaints after a Cologne court ruled in May that non-medical circumcisions on children amounted to a criminal offense. Prosecutors are still considering the first complaint, against Rabbi David Goldenberg from Hof.

Rabbi Yitshak Ehrenberg

The city of Berlin, which also is one of 16 federal German states, is considering not implementing the June Cologne court decision, according to the Jerusalem Post.

"Even if a non-medical circumcision were to take place, it would not meet the elements of severe bodily harm," the prosecutor's office in Berlin wrote in a letter explaining the dismissal of the complaint, the Jerusalem Post reported.

In related news, after an attack on a rabbi in Berlin, Gideon Joffe, the head of the Berlin Jewish community, said he would "not recommend that any Jew go around in parts of Berlin with a kippah".

Last week, Rabbi Daniel Alter of Berlin was violently attacked while picking up his daughter from a piano lesson. He currently is recovering from surgery for a broken cheekbone. The attackers, reportedly youths of Arab background, asked Alter — who was wearing a kippah — if he was Jewish, before hitting him in the face. They then allegedly verbally threatened Alter's 6-year-old daughter.

Many Jewish religious leaders in the country advise congregants against openly wearing Jewish garb in public; men routinely wear baseball caps or other hats over kippahs when in public. Concern about openly wearing the skullcaps grew following an antisemitic attack on the Chabad Jewish kindergarten in Berlin in 2007.

The Central Council of Jews in Germany said the attack proved once again that violent antisemitism is a reality for Jews in Germany. Berlin's mayor, Klaus Wowereit, decried the attack as being against all Berliners.

'A widening assault on Jewish identity'

Yet, Jewish existence is not a joke. Nor is making a good Jewish joke all there is to being Jewish. Jews should know better — especially because the harsh realities of affirming Jewish identity in Europe have returned to haunt Jews who define their identity through so much more than Jewish humour.

When Jews wish to pray regularly in their European synagogues — the same places that opened their doors to the European Day of Jewish Culture on Sunday — they can only do so at their peril or under heavy security.

Jews who wish to publicly display the outward paraphernalia of their faith do so at their peril as well. Chances are they will be beaten up here and there. It has happened before. It will happen again. It rarely gets more than the perfunctory condemnation of a society that, deep down, still feels uncomfortable when Jews dress, eat and pray like Jews.

Jews who wish to give their children a Jewish education know their little ones will grow sheltered in the golden cage of a caring Jewish school — happy islands with no antisemitism inside, thanks to the barbed wire and high walls plus round-the-clock security service outside. They also know that metal detectors and police patrols won't always deter those who thirst for Jewish blood — ask Jews in Toulouse and ask no further, although plenty of others could tell you stories late into the night of how Jewish children grow accustomed to police with sniffer dogs and machine guns outside their kindergartens.

Nor are Jews at liberty to express open, unabashed and unconditional support for Israel — sooner or later, that invites scorn and the occasional abuse (both verbal and physical). Jews get to laugh about themselves at official events, but what's funny about facing criminal charges for circumcising your newborn sons and explosive charges when going to synagogue?

A European Day of Jewish Culture can no longer hide the fact of a widening assault on the most fundamental facets of Jewish identity in today's Europe — the concerted efforts, from all corners of the political spectrum, to ban circumcision of newborn Jewish boys and the ritual slaughter of animals according to Jewish dietary laws.

All this is done in the name of liberal values. Ritual slaughter becomes cruelty to animals. Circumcision becomes an assault on free choice for toddlers to keep their foreskins intact. And the proverbial demonization of Israel as the 21st-century version of apartheid has become the backdoor access for antisemites to join the liberal bandwagon of one standard for Jews and a different one for all other nations.

What makes Jews what they are, ultimately, is not their jokes or their movies or their occasional literary and artistic contributions to western culture. It is the mark in their flesh that solemnly and permanently affirms their commitment to the laws of their forefathers; the head covers and prayer shawls they wear — daily for the pious, occasionally for everyone else — to remind themselves of their Creator and the covenant that binds them to His laws; that which they can and cannot eat for so He commanded, and their love for the land and the people of Israel, with the attendant dream of restoring Zion, in both the mundane and the messianic sense, which pervades their daily prayers, the rhythm of their holidays and their rites of passage from cradle to grave.

And yet, to fearlessly walk the streets of Europe, the parents of a 21st-century-born Jewish child must henceforth forgo his circumcision, make him renounce the outward signs of Jewish devotion, raise him as a vegetarian, lest he break his ancestors' dietary laws, deny him a Jewish education to increase his chances to live to adult age and let him become imbued with a hatred for the country where half his coreligionists live and his ancestors came from or yearned to return to.

This is not a joke. It is what Europe, increasingly, has become for Jews.

Court dismisses damages claim in Rachel Corrie case

Matti Friedman
The Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — A lawsuit filed by the family of Rachel Corrie, an American activist killed by a military bulldozer nine years ago, has been rejected by an Israeli court.

The court ruled that Corrie's death was an accident for which she was responsible and that soldiers had acted with neither intent to harm nor criminal neglect.

Corrie's family slammed the verdict and said they would appeal to the Supreme Court.

Corrie, a 23-year-old native of Olympia, Wash., was crushed to death on March 16, 2003, by a military armoured bulldozer clearing vegetation in a combat zone along the Gaza-Egypt border.

Corrie and other pro-Palestinian activists had confronted two bulldozers and a small infantry contingent guarding the vehicles in an attempt to halt what the activists believed was an impending home demolition. Corrie was in front of the bulldozer's blade trying to block the vehicle when she was killed.

Corrie's family sued Israel over her death, charging that soldiers had either killed her intentionally or acted with reckless neglect. They asserted that the Israeli military was responsible for Corrie's life, even though she had knowingly placed herself in danger to thwart a military operation.

They were seeking a symbolic $1 in damages and legal fees.

Judge Oded Gershon rejected all of the family's claims. "This was a very unfortunate accident and not an action undertaken with intent," Gershon said on Aug. 28 in a courtroom packed with spectators and reporters.

"The deceased put herself into a dangerous situation. She stood in front of a large bulldozer in a place where the operator could not see her. Even when she saw the mound of earth approaching her, she did not distance herself as a reasonable person would have done," he said.

Corrie's death, he ruled, was "the result of an accident she brought upon herself." The family's claim that her death was intentional was "baseless," he said.

The activist's mother, Cindy Corrie, said the family was "deeply saddened and deeply troubled" by the ruling.

"I believe this was a bad day not only for our family but for human rights, for humanity, for the rule of law, and also for the country of Israel," she said at a press conference held by the family after the ruling.

Rachel Corrie Street in Ramallah

She called the Israeli court system "a well-heeled system to protect the Israeli military and the soldiers who take action in that military and provide them with impunity."

"The state has worked extremely hard to make sure that the truth about what happened to my daughter is not known and those responsible will not be held accountable," she said.

The Corries' lawyer, Hussein Abu Hussein, said the family would appeal the lower court's ruling to the Supreme Court.

Corrie was clearly visible because of a bright yellow jacket she was wearing, he said, calling her an "American peace activist who only wanted to protest house demolitions and the great injustice against residents of Gaza."

After her death, Corrie became a hero for opponents of Israel, the subject of a play, and probably the best-known victim of the violence of the second Palestinian intifadah, which claimed more than 6,500 lives. A foundation set up by her family in her honour advocates for an anti-Israel boycott.

The bulldozer operator, an army reservist who was identified only by his first initial, Y., testified in court that because of the armoured vehicle's restricted field of vision he did not see the American.

In the Aug. 28 decision, the court accepted that explanation. An earlier military investigation also cleared the soldiers of wrongdoing, and the judge said that investigation "was not flawed in any way." The Israeli forces on the ground were in "deadly danger" and had acted properly, he said, warning the activists to leave the area in a confrontation that began several hours before Corrie's death. They ignored the warning.

Corrie was a member of the International Solidarity Movement, a pro-Palestinian group that has sent western volunteers to interfere with Israeli military activities in Gaza and the West Bank. The area of the incident, in southern Gaza at the town of Rafah, was one of the most dangerous spots during the peak years of Israeli-Palestinian violence nearly a decade ago.

The commander of the troops on the scene, an infantry major, testified last year that the activists had ignored repeated warnings to leave and were endangering his troops. "It was a war zone," he told the court.

The judge repeated that description in the Aug. 28 decision, saying that from the outbreak of violence in September 2000 and until the day of Corrie's death Israeli forces counted some 6,000 hand grenades thrown at them in the area, as well as 1,400 shooting attacks, 150 explosive devices, 200 anti-tank rockets and more than 40 instances of mortar fire.

Hearings in the trial began in 2010.

In one of the trial's most dramatic moments last year, those present in the courtroom heard a recording from the military radio network during the incident, including the operator's terse report at 5:05 p.m.: "I hit someone."

Corrie, badly wounded, was rushed to a Gaza hospital. She died a short time later.

In related news, former U.S. president Jimmy Carter called the court ruling unacceptable.

"The killing of an American peace activist is unacceptable. The court's decision confirms a climate of impunity, which facilitates Israeli human rights violations against Palestinian civilians in the occupied territory," Carter said in a statement from the Atlanta-based Carter Center.

Carter also said, "I hope that the U.S. government will use all reasonable means to ensure that the rights of American citizens are protected overseas and that justice is done for the Corrie family."

The former president, who has garnered much criticism in recent years for his harsh words about Israel, addressed the Democratic National Convention Sept. 4 via video on the second day of the convention in Charlotte, N.C.

Rocket strikes Sderot

A rocket fired from Gaza into Israel hit a house near Sderot Aug. 31, but no one was injured. Israel Radio reported the same house had sustained a direct hit in the past. The hit caused some damage to the property. Rescue forces treated one person for shock. The area had seen several incoming rockets in the previous few days. The Israel Defence Forces struck munitions depots in Gaza Aug. 29 in response to the rocket fire. Hamas and other terrorist groups have fired more than 450 rockets from Gaza into southern Israel since the beginning of the year, according to the IDF Spokesman's Office.

Rabbi condemns attack

The rabbi of Bat Ayin called a recent attack on a Palestinian taxi "sacrilege." Rabbi Daniel Cohen said he hoped a police investigation, which occurred earlier this month, would show that youths from his community were not involved. The attack left six wounded after a Molotov cocktail hit the driving taxi. Police questioned several youths from Bat Ayin about the incident, which happened near the West Bank settlement. Cohen sent a letter on the subject to all of the settlement's residents. After the Molotov cocktail hit the taxi, it flipped over. Two of the passengers suffered serious injuries, three had moderate injuries and one was lightly wounded. Police found a second, unused Molotov cocktail near the scene.

Police have defined the incident as "a nationalistic Jewish terrorist attack." Nine Jewish teens were indicted for the attack.

Rabbi warns Wilders

Israel's chief Ashkenazi rabbi warned Dutch politician Geert Wilders that attempts to ban ritual slaughter will eventually force Jews to leave the Netherlands. Rabbi Yona Metzger wrote a letter Aug. 29 to Wilders saying he was "shocked and upset" to learn that Wilders' far-right Party for Freedom adopted a ban on ritual slaughter in its election platform. Rabbi Metzger asked Wilders to drop the issue from the platform. The Netherlands will hold general elections Sept. 12. Last year, Wilders' party, the country's third largest, and other parties passed a law to ban ritual slaughter, but the Dutch Senate scrapped it in June. In place of the law, the Senate ratified a compromise between religious freedoms and animal welfare considerations. "By denying Jews to live according to the Torah, you will eventually force them to leave the Netherlands," Rabbi Metzger wrote in the letter.

Morsi won't visit

A day after Israel's foreign minister invited Egyptian President Mohammed Morsi to visit Israel, a Muslim Brotherhood official called such a trip impossible. "There is no possibility for Morsi to visit the Zionist entity," Gamal Heshmat of the Muslim Brotherhood's Freedom and Justice Party told an Egyptian online news magazine, Ynet reported. "President Morsi's patriotism will not allow him to do so," he said, adding the presidential palace will turn down the invitation.

Obama threw Israel 'under the bus': Romney

ITL

TAMPA, Fla. — U.S. President Barack Obama's approach to Iran has made Americans "less secure," Mitt Romney said in his speech accepting the Republican presidential nomination.

"Every American was relieved the day President Obama gave the order and Seal Team Six took out Osama bin Laden," Romney said Aug. 30 at the Republican National Convention. "On another front, every American is less secure today because he has failed to slow Iran's nuclear threat."

He criticized Obama's strategy of diplomatic engagement with Iran. "In his first TV interview as president, he said we should talk to Iran," Romney said.

Mitt Romney

"We're still talking, and Iran's centrifuges are still spinning."

While the speech was mostly focused on introducing Romney to the nation and to attacking Obama's economic record, the GOP nominee devoted several paragraphs to foreign policy.

He accused Obama of having "thrown allies like Israel under the bus," echoing language he had previously used in criticizing the president's approach to the Jewish state.

Romney nodded only briefly toward social issues. "As president, I will protect the sanctity of life. I will honour the institution of marriage," Romney said. "And I will guarantee America's first liberty: the freedom of religion."

He also disparaged the Obama administration's emphasis on countering climate change.

"President Obama promised to begin to slow the rise of the oceans," Romney said, pausing amid laughter from the assembled delegates, "and to heal the planet. My promise is to help you and your family."

UN head rebukes Iran

The Times of Israel

TEHRAN — United Nations Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon delivered a sharp rebuttal to Iranian Supreme Leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei Aug. 30, after Khamenei delivered a speech denouncing Israel, the UN and the United States at the Non-Aligned Movement summit in Tehran.

"I strongly reject any threat by any [UN] member state to destroy another, or outrageous comments to deny historical facts such as the Holocaust," Ban said.

"Claiming another UN member state does not have the right to exist or describe it in racist terms is not only utterly wrong but undermines the very principles we have all promised to uphold," the UN chief added.

Khamenei, who has final say on all state matters in Iran, accused Israel of being made up of "bloodthirsty wolves," a day after Ban asked the cleric to tone down his rhetoric against Israel.

With Ban in attendance, Khamenei blasted the UN Security Council, calling it an illogical, unjust and defunct relic of the past used by the United States and Zionists "to impose its bullying manner on the world."

Khamenei accused the United States of talking about human rights "when what they mean is western interests. They talk of democracy when what they have is military intervention in other countries."

He also reiterated that Iran has never sought nuclear weapons, but will continue to develop its peaceful nuclear energy program, saying that the country considers the use of nuclear weapons to be "a big and unforgivable sin."

Khamenei added that Iran's "motto is nuclear energy for all and nuclear weapons for none."

Iran said the gathering in Tehran showed that western sanctions have not resulted in Iran's diplomatic isolation.

The West suspects Iran is developing a nuclear weapons program, a charge Tehran denies. Last week, Ban urged Iran to take concrete steps to prove to the world that the Iranian program is for civilian use.

Claims Conference criticizes Hungary

JTA

NEW YORK — The Claims Conference accused Hungary's government of "depriving" Holocaust survivors through "disgraceful" and "deceitful tactics."

The allegations came after Budapest demanded Aug. 27, that the Claims Conference, an organization representing world Jewry in compensation talks on Holocaust-era crimes, "return" $12.6 million to Hungary's treasury.

An announcement published on the website of the Hungarian Ministry of Public Administration and Justice cited "discriminatory" methods by the Claims Conference that had "failed to properly report" on expenditure. Hungary would give the Claims Conference no more funds until the issue is solved, the announcement said.

Claims Conference executive vice-president Greg Schneider told JTA that this was the first time in the organization's 62 years of operation "that a country has reneged when it came time to pay. We hope that intervention at the highest level in Hungary will resolve this issue for Hungarian survivors who need help."

According to the Hungarian ministry, the money Hungary is demanding is part of $21 million pledged by the government in 2007 for the following five years for Holocaust survivors in Hungary and abroad. A new settlement was to be signed this year.

The money was transferred initially from the treasury to the Jewish Heritage of Hungary Public Endowment, or Mazsok — a committee of government officials and Jewish representatives. Mazsok transferred $12.6 million to the Claims Conference for distribution outside Hungary, the ministry said.

But the Claims Conference told JTA that the Hungarian government had failed to transfer $5.6 million of the $21 million pledged. In an email to JTA, the Claims Conference said it only spent approximately $8 million received from Hungary.

"As a result of such conduct, thousands of Holocaust survivors will, unfortunately, be deprived of the assistance they so desperately need and had reason to expect," the Claims Conference added. It called Hungary's allegations "disgraceful" and "deceitful tactics."

In its statement, the Hungarian ministry said distribution of funds by the Claims Conference "was made on a far-from-equal footing, which represents discrimination to the detriment of Holocaust survivors living in Hungary." Based on the report submitted by the Claims Conference to date, "it is impossible to identify the individuals eligible for compensation," the ministry wrote on its website.

The Claims Conference, according to the email it sent JTA, gave Budapest a 400-page report containing the names of all recipients and how much they received.

"Every penny was transferred to a Hungarian survivor, not even one cent was spent on administration or any other expense," the Claims Conference said.

The email also said that funding for Holocaust survivors stopped after 2010, when the Fidesz party came to power.

"We call upon Prime Minister Viktor Orban to intercede in order to help needy Hungarian survivors who happen to live outside of Hungary today and comply with international agreements," it said.

Budapest mayor cancels antisemitic play

Cnaan Liphshiz
JTA

BUDAPEST — It was a relieved Judit Csaki who called journalists from Budapest with the news that the news conference on state-sponsored antisemitism she had scheduled for this week was cancelled. Budapest Mayor Istvan Tarlos had just announced the scrapping of plans to stage an antisemitic play at a city-funded theatre.

Csaki, a theatre critic, and her peers, were relieved that someone in power still checks the rampant antisemitism that Hungarian intellectuals, Jews and non-Jews alike, say is growing.

The cancelled play, The Sixth Coffin, is set in 1920 France and features a group of powerful Jews plotting to destroy Hungary and plunge humanity into another world war shortly after World War I had ended. The drama was set to premiere early next year in Budapest's renowned New Theatre, which had received $500,000 last year from the municipality.

For Csaki and Adam Fischer, the general music director of the Austro-Hungarian Haydn Orchestra, the issue was a test case, indicative of increasing government tolerance to antisemitic behaviour.

They and other intellectuals formed an unofficial working group called It Cannot Be that lobbied Tarlos, actors' associations and the local media to stop the staging of what they regarded as "incitement." The mayor had been silent on the issue until last week's announcement.

"Some blame the mayor for letting the whole thing balloon into what it is," Csaki said. "Others blame him for appointing an extreme rightist as director of the New Theatre and for never actually condemning the play. But I don't agree. At least the mayor said something."

On Sept. 4, Fischer, Csaki and other members of the It Cannot Be group were going to announce an international petition calling for a boycott of New Theatre because of the staging of the antisemitic play.

That was before the mayor's announcement that György Dörner, a rightist actor and director of the New Theatre, told him that the theatre would scrap the controversial play and would perform an earlier play by Istvan Csaruka, who wrote The Sixth Column. The mayor said the new play would be "about a completely different subject."

Fischer told JTA that his involvement in the issue "has to do with my family, and all the other victims of the Holocaust. But it is not the Jews alone, not even the Hungarians alone, that worry me; I do believe that tendencies in Hungary are a danger for the whole of Europe."

The play's plot revolves around two Hungarian scientists who invent a time machine that shows the 1920 signing of the Treaty of Trianon — part and parcel of the Versailles Peace Treaty that ended World War I. The machine shows how powerful Jews orchestrated the part in which Hungary loses 72 per cent of its former territory.

According to the script, which was not made public but was obtained by JTA, four Jews had decided to "dismember Hungary" and agitate the hostility that erupted into World War II. One of the Jews, Edmond James Rothschild — presumably the famed Baron Edmond de James Rothschild — is a member of the secret society of Jews and others.

Later in the play, Rothschild says that "countries must keep blaming each other for their strife. I have no interest in giving money for peace." Rothschild is a close friend of Leon Trotsky, the Communist Soviet leader.

"Thus, the capitalist and the Communist Jews are intertwined as the two faces of Jewry," says Sandor Radnoti, a philosopher and arts scholar at Eotvos Lorand University, who is among the intellectuals who criticized the play.

Fischer says the staging and sponsoring of The Sixth Coffin would have been part of an ongoing process of growing acceptance of antisemitism in Hungary.

"Things that were unthinkable five years ago are acceptable today," he recently told the newspaper Nepszabadsag. "An artist must speak up when a publicly funded theatre in the capital of an EU country plans to show antisemitic pieces — something that has not happened since the war," he said, referring to the end of World War II, during which Hungary was led by a pro-Nazi government.

Noting that the ultranationalist political party Jobbik, whose leaders have made antisemitic remarks, is the country's third largest party, Fischer also told Nepszabadsag, "It's not that there is a far-right party in the parliament, but that the parties in power don't suppress rampant antisemitism, thereby encouraging it."

In June, Peter Feldmayer, the president of Hungary's Jewish community, said in a speech before members of the European Parliament in Brussels that Hungarian Jews "feel increasing danger" in a country with a government that condones anti-semitism.

Csaruka, the playwright, was a novelist turned politician who once defined Jews as "chief enemies of the nation." He eventually left politics to direct the New Theatre. He died last year. The Sixth Coffin is his last known play.

Csaruka and Fischer had clashed in the past. Last year, Fischer launched a petition signed by 10,000 people against Csaruka's appointment to co-direct the New Theatre with Dörner. The duo, Fischer warned, would turn the New Theatre into "The New Antisemitic Theatre." Tarlos ignored the petition but said he would not allow antisemitic content.

Scientist fulfills a dream and makes a difference

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

When Alan Bernstein was in his late teens, he aspired to be a scientist. "I just decided I wanted to improve the world and make a difference," the 65-year-old biomedical researcher said recently.

Bernstein has fulfilled his lifelong ambition. In a career spanning decades, he has held some of the most important scientific positions in Canada, having blazed a path in cancer and HIV research.

Several months ago, Bernstein was appointed president and chief executive officer of the Canadian Institute for Advanced Research (CIFAR), which builds long-term, multidisciplinary, collaborative teams of Canadian and international researchers to study diverse topics of importance to Canada and the world.

"It's a wonderful organization that addresses very important issues," said Bernstein, noting that 14 Nobel Prize laureates are associated with CIFAR.

A not-for-profit institution based in Toronto and funded by individuals, corporations, foundations, the federal government and the governments of Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia, CIFAR supports the research of 396 top-flight, prize-winning scientists in Canada and 16 countries, including Israel.

CIFAR runs 12 different programs in fields ranging from earth system evolution and genetic networks to nanoelectronics and quantum information processing.

Bernstein claims that CIFAR is unique, the only organization of its kind that brings together the best scientists around one topic and supports their research for extended periods of time.

Apart from advancing knowledge in technological, economic and social spheres, CIFAR has been instrumental in bringing renowned scientists from the United States and abroad to Canada and keeping Canadian researchers in Canada. As a result, CIFAR has made a valuable contribution to this country.

"That has paid off in many different ways," said Bernstein. "In terms of our size, Canada stands very high up there in research and innovation. Our universities are stronger today than 25 years ago. We publish four per cent to five per cent of the world's research papers. Many Canadians have received international awards. On a per capita basis, we're punching above our weight. We're right up there."

Bernstein, who joined CIFAR in May, said he would give himself about two months to decide what changes will be necessary to take it to the next level.

"I'm in listening mode now," he explained. "I'm talking to members of the board, staff and scientists."

He is proceeding from the assumption that if CIFAR is not "broke," there is no real need to "fix" it. As he put it, "No changes will be taken lightly."

But thinking out loud, Bernstein expressed a desire to add yet more interdisciplinary research programs to CIFAR's already impressive roster.

"And I'd like, somehow, to open up the process by which new programs are started," he added. "I've been thinking, in a broad sense, of how new ideas and concepts can come forward."

Bernstein also hopes to increase its present annual budget from $17 million to $25 or $30 million.

"One of my jobs will be to raise funds," he said, acknowledging that times are tough. "Our funding has not gone up in five or 10 years."

While discussing fundraising, he pointed out that Jews were among CIFAR's first donors. "The Jewish community has been so supportive of scholarship and learning. This philanthropy almost defines us a people, and I'm proud to be part of that tradition."

Bernstein believes that CIFAR's record of solid accomplishments will help pave the way for achieving his financial objective.

"CIFAR's approach to solving problems is very important," he said, citing its contribution to public policy in early childhood learning, its finding proving that there is a relationship between a person's health and a person's socio-economic status, and its discoveries in quantum physics.

Prior to joining CIFAR, Bernstein was the first executive director of the Global

Alan Bernstein, CEO of Canadian Institute for Advanced Studies

HIV Vaccine Enterprise, an alliance of researchers and funders charged with accelerating the search for an HIV vaccine.

"We developed a global strategic plan," he said, noting that HIV is probably the most significant health problem in the universe today.

Asked when a vaccine can be developed, he replied, "Who knows? Medical trials take time."

Last year, more than one million people died of AIDS, with another one million having been infected. Yet progress has been made in combating this scourge, he said.

"We now have a half dozen drugs to keep it in check, and people infected by it live almost a normal life."

Before leading Global HIV Vaccine Enterprise, Bernstein was founding president of the Canadian Institutes of Health Research, a federal agency, where he worked wonders.

He transformed the method in which health research is organized and funded. He created networks of scientists in virtual institutes. He was instrumental in increasing Canada's health research budget by a factor of two.

Bernstein's previous two jobs were at the Ontario Cancer Institute and the Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute.

At the Ontario Cancer Institute, the first position he held after receiving a PhD from the University of Toronto, he and his colleagues identified new genes in childhood cancer and a new gene in stem cells.

And at the Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute, where he was eventually director of research, Bernstein worked to develop a corps of scientists, secured funding during an era of cutbacks and oversaw the construction of a new floor.

According to Bernstein, cancer researchers have made impressive breakthroughs. "We've come a long, long way," he said, citing examples.

"Childhood leukemia used to be a death sentence. Now there's a 90 percent cure rate. In breast cancer, we've improved methods of diagnosis and surgery and developed better drugs. And cure rates are going up."

To Bernstein, prevention is an integral component in the battle against lung cancer. "We can prevent lung cancer," he observed, saying that smokers have every reason to dispense with cigarettes now that researchers have confirmed that smoking is a major cause of cancer.

More effective, less toxic drugs are having a positive impact as well.

"In the future, as we enter a new era in precision medicine, cancer will be more treatable," he said.

Bernstein, born in Toronto, is the son of Max and Shirley Bernstein, both of whom immigrated to Canada from Poland in the 1920s. His father was a partner in a dress factory.

Bernstein's sister, Sharon, is a doctor, while his brother, Steve, is a lawyer. Bernstein's wife, JoAnn, is a retired investment banker. They have five children in their blended family.

Once a student at the Etz Chaim School, Bernstein is a cellist and an aficionado of classical music who likes modern art and is fond of cycling and walking.

He has no intention of retiring.

"If you work on an assembly line, it's tiring and you retire. But in science, you think about important things, and you interact with young people. Why would I retire?"

FORMER CONDUCTOR OF COLLEGE STREETCAR YIDDISH POET IS BEING REMEMBERED IN SONG - ON COLLEGE STREET

Tramway Lieder (Streetcar Songs) is the title of a set of poems by Toronto Yiddish poet and streetcar conductor Shimen Nepom about life on the streetcar.

Nepom, who was born in Ukraine in 1890 and died in Toronto in 1939, is being remembered in performance this week by Charles Heller, who has set some of the poems to music and baritone.

"With their images of journeying through the bitter Toronto winter to make a living during the harsh years of the Depression," the Streetcar Songs "evoke the journeying and existential quest of Schubert's Winterreise," according to Heller, an accomplished composer-arranger who worked with the late Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach and the late Marvin Hamlish.

It seems especially fitting that Heller is preparing to sing these songs - to the accompaniment of Brahm Goldhamer's piano - at the Free Times Café 320 College St., along the same route that Nepom once drove as a conductor. Yiddish Vinkl, Thursday Sept. 6, noon, $18 includes buffet lunch. RSVP: sol@yiddish-vinkl.com

Salute to Jerusalem: Celebrity chef David Rocco cooks up some spectacular Roman cuisine at Saluti a Jerusalem, a food, art, music and wine event presented by the Jerusalem Foundation and Villa Charities. The event also includes a photo exhibit by Neil Dankoff and Beverley Abramson. $250; proceeds to help build a friendship garden at Canada House in Jerusalem. 416-635-5491. ileventhal@jerusalemfoundation.ca

The Sistine Secrets: Roy Doliner, co-author of the bestselling book The Sistine Secrets, speaks on the Jewish symbolism, secret messages and forbidden mystical knowledge concealed within the paintings in the Sistine Chapel. Presented by the Koffler Centre of the Arts, Joseph D. Carrier Art Gallery, Columbus Centre, 901 Lawrence Ave. W. Sept 6, 7:30 p.m. Free admission but RSVP required to vmoreno@kofflerarts.org or phone 416-638-4249.

Names in the News: Joseph Baruch Silver, a former Torontonians who is now an Israeli senator living in Jerusalem, has loaned some snuff bottles, scroll artwork and other items to the Royal Ontario Museum for inclusion in the exhibition Small Skills. Special Effects: Unusual Chinese Works of Art, which opened in July. Silver's valuable snuff bottles have previously been the subject of a show at the Gardiner Museum, right across the street from the ROM; he met Ka Bo Tsang, curator of the ROM show, years ago at an international snuff bottle society meeting. The exhibition continues at the ROM until next February.

- Lore, a film by Australian writer-director Cate Shortland, offers a riveting and complex look into a rarely seen legacy of the Holocaust. The 14-year-old daughter of two SS officers in wartime Germany must put her trust in the very person she was always taught to hate in order to survive. The film is an official selection of the upcoming 2012 Toronto International Film Festival.

At the Galleries: Homeland, an exhibition of art works by London, Ont.-based artist Thelma Rosner, focuses on the Palestinian and Israeli communities of Israel - "divided by conflict, yet connected by history, culture and national aspirations." A painter, Rosner uses doubling, reversal and mirroring of images to convey the conflicting territorial claims of the two peoples. While the doubling affirms the values and validity of both cultures, opposition is implied in the reversals and the use of walls or fences. The doubling created by mirrors also suggests places both real and unrealized. Homeland is on view at Museum London (London, Ont.) until Oct. 28.

- Oil paintings and multi-media prints and drawings on paper by Ira Moscovitz, an artist who traveled the world in search of the mystical, highlight themes of Native American and Parisian culture; Moscovitz also did some book illustrations for Isaac Bashevis Singer's fiction. His exhibition, Spiritual Routes, is on view in the Miles Nadal JCC, Sept. 13 to 26. Presented by the Al Green Gallery and Ashkenaz.

People trump politics in Zaytoun

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

In Eran Riklis' Zaytoun, scheduled to be screened at the Toronto International Film Festival on Sunday, Sept. 9, the allure of human relations trumps the passion of the Arab-Israeli conflict.

The film, set on the eve of Israel's 1982 invasion of Lebanon, is about the unlikely friendship between Yoni, a downed Israeli pilot, and Fahed, a 12-year-old Arab boy whose family lives in a Palestinian refugee camp but yearns to return to its ancestral village in what is now Israel.

This remarkable relationship is the figment of screenwriter Nader Rizq's fertile imagination. As implausible as it may be in the real world, it seems reasonably plausible in Riklis's fine-tuned, poignant film, which takes place in Beirut, the Lebanese countryside and Israel.

Zaytoun opens as an unidentified Israeli pilot in a fighter jet approaches his target and as a young Palestinian far below hawks gum and cigarettes on a crowded street. The pilot, as we will see, is Yoni. The boy is Fahed.

Brash and high spirited, Fahed, Abdallah El Akel, lives with his father and grandfather in a squalid camp inhabited by Palestinian refugees and their descendants.

Their Lebanese neighbours do not like them. Throughout the film, in a reflection of their animosity, the Lebanese refer to the Palestinians in their midst with undisguised disdain, calling them "dogs" and "shitty Palestinians."

Fahed could not care less what his Lebanese neighbours think of him and his fellow Palestinians, saving his venom for Israel and Israelis. At a martial arts camp run by Palestinian militants, where he learns to jump over barriers and assemble sub-machine guns, he dreams of liberating Palestine, throwing Jews into the sea and returning to his family's home.

When Yoni is shot down near his camp, Fahed gets the chance to meet a living, breathing representative of the enemy: Yoni (Stephen Dorff), disheveled and a hood covering his face, is shackled and kept in an enclosure.

At first, Fahed exhibits hostility toward Yoni, refusing to give him water or return a photograph of his sweetheart. Yoni, gruff and self-confident, ridicules the notion that Fahed and the Palestinians can ever go back to their long, lost homeland.

Despite their irreconcilable differences, they reach a mutually beneficial understanding that enables Yoni to escape and Fahed to catch a glimpse of his family's ancestral village.

A greedy Lebanese taxi driver, having extracted the promise of a huge fare from Yoni, drives the pair toward the Israeli border. As they glide down a coastal road, the beat from the Bee Gees' hit song, Stayin' Alive, fills the screen with irresistible intensity.

Fahed has prepared himself for this special journey: He wears a pendant in the shape of a map of Palestine. In his pocket is a key that can supposedly unlock the door of his grandfather's old house in Israel. And in the back seat, in a pot, is a small olive tree that he intends to plant in his grandfather's village.

As they travel southward, Yoni and Fahed warm to each other and help each other out in life-and-death situations, discovering their respective humanity as political dogmas fall away. Thanks to Yoni, Fahed realizes his dream of setting foot in "Palestine" and planting the olive tree in a now ruined village. The tree-planting scene is politically charged, underscoring the recurring Palestinian theme of "the return." Nonetheless, Zaytoun, which unfolds in Arabic, English and Hebrew, is not really and truly a political film.

Although Riklis is clearly sympathetic to Palestinian grievances, a point that emerged in one of his last movies, Lemon Tree, he seems more interested in the mechanics and joys of people-to-people relations.

The lead actors acquit themselves with professional aplomb.

Dorff, an American, carries himself with understated strength and dignity, and surprisingly, his Hebrew accent is flawless. El Akel, a newcomer to the screen, is quite impressive as well, mixing anger and rage with tenderness and empathy.

Zaytoun appears to have been shot in Israel. What seems like Israeli Arab neighbourhoods, towns and pastoral rural areas fill in realistically for Beirut and a whole host of Lebanese locales.

Author refutes notion that we're running out of oil

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

The quest for energy has consumed mankind since the creation of the modern oil industry in the mid-19th century.

Energy has been an engine of global political and economic change since a prospector named Edwin Drake struck oil in the small Pennsylvania town of Titusville in 1859.

That seminal discovery touched off a scramble for new sources, and by the late 19th century, new production centres had arisen in the Russian Empire, the Dutch East Indies and the Austro-Hungarian Empire.

In the Middle East, oil was not discovered in commercial quantities until the first decade of the 20th century. Iran in 1908, Iraq in 1927, Saudi Arabia in the 1930s. But since then, the Mideast has become a primary source of our seemingly insatiable need for oil and natural gas.

At first, oil was used to illuminate homes and factories, replacing whale oil. But with the passage of time, petroleum found other uses and quickly became a global commodity that enriched such entrepreneurs as John D. Rockefeller, the co-founder of Standard Oil.

Although the resource seemed plentiful enough, there was always a fear that there was only a finite amount of it and that supplies would soon run out.

As early as 1885, the state geologist of Pennsylvania – the Saudi Arabia of its day – warned that “the amazing exhibition of oil” was only a “temporary and vanishing phenomenon.” His alarmism prompted Rockefeller's partner to sell some of his shares at a discount.

Daniel Yergin, in The Quest: Energy, Security, and the Remaking of the Modern World (The Penguin Press), refutes the hoary notion that we've reached the limits of oil production.

In an upbeat assessment, Yergin – an American whose previous book was The Prize: The Epic Quest for Oil, Money and Power – writes that recoverable reserves have been and will be discovered due to advances in communications, computers and information technology.

According to Yergin, three breakthroughs have made this brave new era in oil prospecting attainable.

“The rapid advances in microprocessing made possible the analysis of vastly more data, enabling geophysicists to greatly improve their interpretation of underground structures and thus improve exploration success.”

The second advance was the advent of horizontal drilling, he notes.

Wells drilled from piers near Santa Barbara, California, in the 1890s pioneered the offshore oil industry.

that went straight down, wells could now be drilled vertically for the first few thousand feet and then driven at an angle or even sideways with drilling progress tightly controlled and measured every few feet with very sophisticated tools. This meant that much more of the reservoir could be accessed, thus increasing production.”

The third breakthrough concerned the development of software and computer visualization, he says.

This enabled billion-dollar offshore production platforms to be designed down to the tiniest detail on a computer screen even before welding began on the first piece of steel.

“These and other technological advances mean that companies could do things that had only recently been unattainable, whether in terms of identifying new prospects, tackling fields that could not be developed before, taking on much more complex projects and recovering more oil.”

But as Yergin observes, production advances can be neutralized by what he describes as “critical choke points” along major sea routes.

The transport of oil can be affected by wars, terrorist attacks or accidents. Iran, for example, has threatened to close the strategic Strait of Hormuz, through which much of the world's oil exports move, should Israel or the United States bomb its nuclear facilities.

Yergin identifies other choke points that unfriendly powers could exploit: the Malacca Strait between Malaysia and the Indonesian island of Sumatra, the Bosphorus Strait that connects the Black Sea to the Sea of Marmara in Turkey and the Bab e-Mandeb Strait in the Red Sea.

In the past, particularly in World War II, oil has played a pivotal role in conflicts, he points out.

“Japan's fear of lack of access to oil was one of the critical factors in (its) decision to go to war. Hitler made a fateful decision to invade the Soviet Union not only because he hated the Slavs and communism, but also because he coveted the oil resources of the Caucasus.”

“The German U-boat campaign twice came close to cutting the oil line from North America to Europe. The Allies, in turn, were determined to disrupt the oil supplies of both Germany and Japan. Inadequate supplies of fuel put the brakes on both General Erwin Rommel's campaign in North Africa and General George Patton's sweep across France after the D-Day landing.”

Yet, as he observes, the U.S.-led allied invasion of Iraq in 2003 was not really about oil, as some contend.

“Neither the Americans nor the British were pursuing a mercantilist 1920s-style ambition to control Iraqi oil. The issue was not who owned the oil at the well-head, but whether it was available on the world market.”

By 2001, when United Nations sanctions were biting deeply into Iraq's economy, the United States was importing 800,000 barrels of its oil per day.

“A democratic Iraq, it was certainly thought, would be a more reliable provider and, not being under sanctions, could expand its capacity.”

The relationship between the price of oil and prosperity has been documented, but rarely was it as crystal clear as during the recession of 2008 and 2009.

The surge in prices from 2007 onward coincided with a screeching slowdown in the sale of new homes, tipping the U.S. economy into a serious recession.

“The sudden increase of prices at the pump took purchasing power away from lower-income groups, making it more difficult for many of them to make payments on their subprime mortgages and their other debts. The higher cost of the gasoline they needed to get to work meant trade-offs in terms of what else they could spend elsewhere.”

Yergin predicts that global energy consumption in 2030 will be 35 to 40 per cent greater than it is today, but that extracting these resources will be extremely expensive, requiring as much as $8 trillion in funding.

However, he suggests that endlessly “renewable” and environmentally friendly sources, such as wind, sunlight, biofuels and geothermal power, may yet release us from the tyranny of oil.

The Quest, which is comprehensively thorough and eminently readable, lays out the options in layman's language.

Ludwig Guttman, the 'angel of the Paralympics'

Miriam Shaviv
JTA

LONDON — In 1917, Ludwig Guttman, a young German Jew volunteering as an orderly in the local Accident Hospital for Coalminers, came across a strong miner with a broken back. The patient, he was told, would be dead within three months. In fact, he died after five weeks.

"Although I saw many more victims suffering the same fate," Guttman wrote in his memoirs, "it was the picture of that young man which remained indelibly fixed in my memory."

The encounter changed history.

Guttman, who eventually fled Nazi Germany to the United Kingdom, became a doctor and was inspired to specialize in patients with spinal injuries. He eventually founded a sports competition for the disabled, which evolved into the Paralympics, and now is commonly regarded as the "father" of the Paralympic Games.

The Games, which use the Olympics facilities, run this year from Aug. 29 through Sept. 9.

While awareness of the German-English refugee had faded since his death in 1980, it is now enjoying a revival. One of the Olympic mascots was named Mandeville: during World War II, Guttman was asked by the government to set up a spinal unit at Stoke Mandeville hospital, north of London, to help the expected many disabled veterans from the war.

Also, earlier this month, the BBC screened The Best of Men, a drama based on Guttman's work at the hospital. And London's Jewish Museum is showing a small exhibit about Guttman's work through Sept. 16 comprised mainly of photos and documents from Stoke Mandeville and the early Games, and memorabilia that Guttman brought back from the second Paralympics, in Tokyo.

Meanwhile, a life-size bronze statue of Guttman has been placed at the Stoke Mandeville hospital's stadium that will be transferred later to the hospital, while a new bust of Guttman will be present at every future Games.

"It is a huge irony," said Abigail Morris, chief executive of London's Jewish Museum, speaking before the Games. "Hitler tried to kill all the Jews and people with disabilities. Thanks to his actions, Guttman ended up here, in the UK, and this year over 4,000 athletes will compete in London at the Paralympic Games. It's the triumph of human spirit over adversity."

In fact, Guttman had an even broader legacy than the Paralympics — he is widely credited with revolutionizing the treatment of spinal injuries.

Guttman, who was born in 1899 to a traditional Jewish family in Tost, Upper Silesia, was a senior neurosurgeon at Breslau Hospital until 1933, when the Nazis made it illegal for Jews to work in Aryan hospitals. Guttman moved to the local Jewish hospital and was elected its medical director in 1937.

Two years later, the Council for Assisting Refugee Academics brought him to the United Kingdom with his wife and two young children. He was partially escaping the attention of the Gestapo, who first noticed him on the night of Kristallnacht in November 1938, when he admitted more than 60 men to the hospital, fictitiously claiming that they all had serious medical conditions.

At first he worked in medical research at a prestigious infirmary in the university town of Oxford; Germans were not allowed to practice medicine in the United Kingdom. Soon, however, the government noticed a paper he wrote about how to treat people with spinal injuries. They were expecting many disabled veterans from the war and asked him to set up a special spinal unit at Stoke Mandeville.

At the time, people with spinal injuries were "left as lumps of waste" to die, says Mike Mackenzie, chair of the Poppa Guttman Trust, which promotes Guttman's legacy. Guttman, however, actually wanted to treat them. He realized that the two main causes of death were sepsis from pressure sores and urinary infections, and instructed the nurses to turn patients in their beds every two hours to prevent the sores from developing. He also improved catheterization.

Initially he faced resistance from the medical staff. But, says Mackenzie — himself a patient in Stoke Mandeville after breaking his back in a car accident in 1993 — "people finally stood a chance of living."

Guttman also focused on their mental health.

"He was ahead of the curve with the idea that your mental state makes a massive difference, that your bodies and brains are one," Morris says. "For these men to live, they had to want to live. You had to give them a life worth living."

One of Guttman's ideas was to involve them in sport. On the day that the 1948 Olympic Games opened in London, Guttman organized an archery competition for 16 patients at Stoke Mandeville, which he then repeated every year. In 1952, the games became international when a team of Dutch ex-servicemen was included. In 1960, for the first time, the games took place at the same venue as the mainstream Olympics. The Rome games attracted 400 athletes from 23 countries and are commonly regarded as the first Paralympics, although the term did not become official until 1988.

According to Mackenzie, Guttman's belief in the healing power of sport partially stemmed from his experience as a youth in Germany.

"A number of Jewish fraternities used sports to prove to themselves that they're as good as anyone," he says. "Guttman was a fencing athlete and knew what it had done for him and his fellow Jews in Germany, giving them confidence and ability."

He was fuelled by an "extraordinary mixture" of empathy with his patients and ruthless determination.

"He was a bit of a tyrant," Mackenzie says. "Patients got seriously blasted if they skipped a session in the gym. He was liked and loathed by patients and other authorities, but was considered to be remarkable in what he achieved. By the end of rehab everybody was grateful to him."

Guttman, who was knighted in 1966, died of heart failure in 1980 after achieving considerable international renown. In 1974 he visited Heidelberg, Germany, where a street was named for him. Newspaper clips in the small Jewish Museum exhibit show him described as "the famous Englishman from Germany" and "the angel of the Paralympics."

For Morris of the Jewish Museum, ultimately, Guttman is a very Jewish story.

"It's that moment when not only do you pick yourself up but you make the world a better place, helping people who literally are forgotten and left to die," she says. "Guttman gave these people life. It's the spirit of I'chaim — to life."

Ludwig Guttman

Israeli swimmer wins bronze

JTA

LONDON — Israeli Paralympic swimmer Inbal Pezaro finally brought Israel its first medal in London — at the Paralympic Games.

Pezaro, 25, took a bronze in the 50-metre freestyle final in the S5 disability swimming class. She finished in 37.89 seconds, coming in, respectively, behind a Ukrainian and a Spanish swimmer.

The athlete, who has been swimming since the age of five, was paralyzed at birth when her lower limbs suffered complications due to the performance of blood vessels in her spinal cord.

This is Pezaro's sixth Paralympic medal. She won three silver medals in Beijing in 2008 and a silver and bronze in the 2004 Athens games.

Israel has known great success at the Paralympics since its athletes made their first appearance at the 1960 games in Rome. In total, athletes from the Jewish state have won more than 330 Paralympic medals, including 113 golds. In 1968, Israel even hosted the international event.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Studying the Mishnah through video blogs

Vicky Tobianah
Special to The CJN

After arguing with a friend who said she was “living with Judaism” – and that it was a negative thing – Elana Shilling decided to prove that living with Judaism could be turned into something positive.

A few weeks ago, she launched her video blog, or vlog, hoping to show that it was possible to bridge modernity with traditional Judaism.

Shilling, 22, has been video blogging as she learns the Mishnah, the oral Torah, according to the daf yomi cycle, where Jews learn a page of Talmud a day, eventually completing the entire work in 7-1/2 years.

Knowing that this was probably too large a commitment to keep, she is instead learning just the Mishnah, but not the whole Talmud, that is without the Gemarah, the commentary on the Mishnah.

“The idea was for me to have a chavrutah [a learning partner] because I didn’t want to do it in a traditional way,” Shilling said.

“I wanted a format that allowed me to learn in an interactive way. I thought, ‘Why have one person as your chavrutah when you can have a lot of people?’”

Using YouTube as her chavrutah, Shilling video blogs about her thoughts on the Mishnah.

“Even though a mishnah [a specific proposition of law] is short, I could do way more than a four-minute blog on it,” she said. “Instead I pick one problem and questions I have with it and talk about that. It makes it easier to grapple with.”

Shilling’s passion for Jewish learning is seen in every episode as she speaks with fervour about each topic, with eyes wide open and her animated face looking straight into the camera. In some videos, she brings on guest learning partners like her brother, and in others, she uses props like Hershey’s chocolate kisses to illustrate her point.

She hopes to find ways to make each mishnah relevant.

This is especially evident in her sixth episode, called R.E.S.P.E.C.T., where Shilling is learning Massechet Brachot, chapter 2, mishnah 1.

Rather than just discussing what she learned, she tries to direct questions to the audience – her chavrutah – and find a real-life example for the teachings of the Mishnah.

“Imagine you’re at work and you’re reading the Shema and your boss comes over to you and says, ‘Have you done your accounting report?’” she says in the episode. “Even if you’re smack dab in the middle of the Shema, in the middle of a word, you’re allowed to answer him. The Mishnah understands you’re afraid to get in trouble.”

It’s these real-life examples that make Shilling’s teachings applicable to modern Jewish life.

“So far, I’ve found a lot of things that fit into my life. For example, the Mishnah talked about respect, and that’s obviously something you have to have in a modern world to get around,” Shilling said.

And from the comments she’s received on her YouTube channel, it is clear viewers are taking the chavrutah idea seriously, asking Shilling questions and disagreeing when they feel she’s not right.

“As I understand the word chavrutah, it is supposed to be a debate or give and take,” one person commented. “So I do not plan on being shy about disagreeing with points made (should they come up), as this true Torah study is through debate and argument (all remaining civil and friendly), and I urge my fellow viewers of this cool Mishnah blog to do the same,” one viewer wrote.

She hopes to find ways to apply each mishnah directly to her modern life.

“So far, I’ve found a lot of things that fit into my life,” Shilling said.

“Actually, so far, I’m finding that you can live with Judaism, but [the project has] only just begun.”

Shilling first realized how difficult it could be to incorporate Judaism into a modern life when she began her psychology studies at McGill University.

“I’ve always been interested in the relationship between modernity and Judaism, ever since university when I got out of the Jewish bubble and had to deal with Judaism in a context of modernity and not in a context of Thornhill.

“At CHAT [the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto], it’s all laid out for you – you get holidays off, there’s kosher food everywhere, but in university you’re out of the Jewish bubble,” she said.

This project combines her love for the dramatic arts and her interest in Jewish studies.

As a child, she appeared in TV commercials and movies, including a small role in the 2004 Hollywood film Mean Girls.

She still acts while managing her jobs as a youth program coordinator at Beth Shalom Synagogue in Toronto, a drama specialist for Associated Hebrew School of Toronto’s after-school program, and in her stepmother’s kosher bakery, Tastes Like More.

She’s been surprised by how much support she’s received for the project.

“I didn’t expect it,” she said. “I kind of just thought it would be one or two friends interested in it, but lots of people are encouraging me to continue. Many people have said it’s nothing like they’ve ever seen before.”

So far, her videos have been viewed almost 2,000 times.

A project that initially started as a response to a flippant comment has morphed into an almost daily video blog and hours of learning Mishnah by herself and with her viewers.

“The real goal is to continue for 7-1/2 years, but in actuality, I don’t know. I’m taking it day by day, mishnah by mishnah,” said Shilling.

Her goal is to learn more about Judaism while also encouraging others to take on Jewish learning themselves – and even challenge her thoughts and assumptions.

“I hope that people are questioning every single thing I’m saying and have some questions themselves and continue where I leave off because I only give a brief overview,” she said.

Another birthday - ugh!

Dear Ella,

Yesterday I celebrated my 65th birthday. Normally birthdays don't bother me, but for some reason, turning 65 did. I woke up in the morning dreading the day. It started when I looked in the bathroom mirror. There was an old woman looking back at me. My laugh lines are so deep my cheeks roll over them, my eyelids are so wrinkly I can barely get any eyeliner on that still comes out looking like a straight line, and the creases around my mouth have multiplied. My once-toned skin, is now hanging all around me.

The realization that my days are numbered hit me hard. I feel worse with every birthday wish as my family and friends acknowledged my birthday via phone calls, flowers, Facebook, emails. My husband, daughters and grandkids decorated the house, and I woke up to brewing coffee, pancakes and shouts of "Happy Birthday."

I did my best to crack a smile, but it was obvious to all that I was sad. Just before bed last night, my husband Jeff told me he loved me and that I was as beautiful as the day he married me. It's what every woman dreams of hearing, but I took it as a patronizing remark. I know he didn't mean it that way, but my head was not in the right place. What's wrong with me?

Can't Stop Time

Dear Can't Stop Time,

The simple fact that you are here to celebrate your 65th birthday is the best gift you'll ever get. There is no better accomplishment. Year after year, we are obsessed with the way we look, with new aches and pains, with how much harder it is to lose weight and - let's not forget - how many new wrinkles came out. There's a reason that plastic surgeons have waiting lists and cosmetic counters are overflowing with anti-aging creams. Throughout life, people have always aspired to find a way to stop time. It doesn't exist.

But what if we put a different spin on how you feel about aging. For example, those laugh lines you hate so much - how much laughter went into making them? Maybe when you and Jeff kissed for the first time. Or what about when your kids said something funny or when one of your daughters brought you that hand-made mother's day card? And let's not forget that huge smile when you held your first grandchild.

What about those wrinkly eyelids that protect those eyes that have seen so much in 65 years? People look into your eyes and see your wisdom, your emotion, your soul. As for those lines around your mouth? It's the same mouth that has lifted spirits, recited pep talks, offered words of wisdom and love for so many years.

You have a very rich life and you need and deserve to celebrate that. Each and every birthday you spend with your health and your family intact is a gift that should make you insanely happy, instead of looking for flaws that are the very proof of the wonderful life you have lived.

Celebrate every one of those wrinkles. They tell the story of who you are. To quote Abe Lincoln, "It's not the years in your life that count, it's the life in your years."

Palliative and end-of-life care

Most health-care professionals who are involved in palliative and end-of-life care have chosen that aspect of health care because of a belief in or a personal and professional attraction to assisting those with some of the greatest needs that anyone receiving health-care services can anticipate.

For those health-care providers who have no interest in this aspect of care, there are other areas of health care that provide various degrees of personal and professional satisfaction.

From the early days of my training and career, when I participated in surgery and obstetrics and critical and emergency-room care, and during a period in military medicine, I realized that all of these aspects of health care bring something special to the patients who are cared for, while the families wait in fear, terror or guarded anticipation for the outcome.

There is a general congruence of healthcare professionals between patients and families depending on the expected or hoped-for outcome, with the knowledge that sometimes things do not go the way hoped for or expected and that presents special challenges for those involved.

For mothers, fathers, grandparents and siblings and physicians and nurses, a successful birth is an unparalleled joyful experience. Those words, "It's a boy... or girl... or twins," are pure smile- and tear-provoking experiences. On the other hand, telling a family, as I have unfortunately done in my career, that a birth did not go well, and not only the baby but the mother has succumbed, is not matched in terms of tragedy and tears by many other happenings in the health-care world.

WARM CHOCOLATE HONEY TORTE

1 (6 oz) cup semisweet chocolate chips
1/2 c butter or parve margarine
1/2 c honey
4 eggs, separated
2 tbs flour
1 tbl instant coffee granules
1/2 tsp baking soda
1/4 tsp salt

Line bottom of 9"-inch springform pan with parchment paper. In medium saucepan over low heat, melt butter; stir in chocolate chips. Remove from heat; continue stirring until chocolate is melted. Gradually add honey, stirring to blend. In separate bowl, lightly beat egg yolks; whisk into chocolate mixture. Stir in flour, coffee, baking soda and salt. In lg bowl, beat egg whites until soft peaks form. Fold 1/4 of egg whites into chocolate mixture. Stir chocolate mixture into remaining whites. Pour mixture into prepared pan. Bake 45 min. at 325° F or until toothpick inserted halfway from center to edge comes out clean; cool 5 min. Run knife around edge to loosen cake. Invert cake onto plate; remove paper. Serve warm.

We know the kinds of challenges faced by those who focus on end-of-life and palliative care, whether in the acute-care setting, the home setting or hospice and palliative-care units, when patients haven't come to terms with the seriousness and time-limited period of the life that is left for them. We have learned to address the discomforts, and I have learned to appreciate the unbelievable art and skill that are usually part of the repertoire of a team of dedicated health-care providers.

Sometimes, an event occurs that makes those practising palliative care proud of what lengths we are able to go in order to meet the extraordinary requests of a dying patient and his family.

One recent situation that occurred in the Baycrest Palliative Care Unit involved an elderly gentleman with advanced metastatic malignancy that required complex palliative symptom management. He always wanted to live and die in Israel. To arrange for him to die there became the dedicated mission of the team. On the surface, it seemed almost impossible to achieve. However, through the tireless efforts of the medical, nursing and social-work staff and a social-work student working with this patient and family, this goal was achieved.

Working with Israel immigration and an agency called Nefesh B'Nefesh (loosely "soul to soul"), arrangements were made through the generosity of El Al Airlines to transport the patient to Israel and then have him absorbed as an immigrant and admitted to a palliative-care program at the Hadassah Hospital in Jerusalem - a monumental feat.

The staff and patient celebration on the day of his departure was full of tears and smiles for a job very well done and poignantly and deeply meaningful for all concerned.

'Be compassionate with our children'

How can we not smile back at the adorable faces of the two youngsters looking at us in the photo above? True, the photo is staged. It is, after all, a Rosh Hashanah greeting intended to evoke cheerful, positive feelings in us.

The young boy and girl nearly glow with happiness, their innocent, guileless faces looking directly at us. The cake they are carrying is undoubtedly the very essence of the figurative sweetness we pray for as blessing for the coming year, for others and ourselves. Underneath the colourful, decorative icing there is likely a traditional honey cake. Perhaps that explains why the youngsters are smiling? They were promised the first piece!

If we look very carefully at the photo, we will notice that there is a third child in the photo as well. He or she is holding the large poster with the Hebrew letters that spell the greeting "Shanah Tovah." All we see of him or her, alas, are the little fingers on either side of the poster.

That this particular greeting is entirely child-centred is a wholly fitting entry to the holiday we will celebrate in just a few days. Our minds are usually so preoccupied with worries for the world, for the community, for ourselves, that we sometimes forget this because our first association with Rosh Hashanah, indeed with the 10-day period leading up to Yom Kippur is of self-assessment, renewal and new beginnings.

But our ancient sages were quite clear about the centrality to the holiday of the references to children. They designed the structure of the observance to ensure it. They wanted our children - all children - to be a key fulcrum in the weighing of the measure of our achievements and our purposes in the grand balance of Creation we call life.

Each Torah portion and prophetic Haftarah of the two-day holiday deals explicitly with the story of a child.

Hate Charge Stayed

REGINA — A judge stayed a hate charge Sept. 6 against a former University of Regina math instructor because the case was taking too long to get to trial. Terry Tremaine was charged in 2008 with wilfully promoting hate online for web postings he allegedly made between 2004 and 2007 calling Jews a "parasitic race" and black culture "fundamentally depraved and disgusting." But the judge in the case said 50 months had passed since the charge was laid when Tremaine's lawyer asked that it be stayed last March. The judge said the white supremacist's constitutional right to a timely trial had been violated. The Crown said it would take time to review the decision before deciding whether to appeal it.

Sportswriter Dies

MONTREAL — Montreal sportswriter and broadcaster Larry Fredericks died Sept. 3 after a brief illness. He was 77. Fredericks, whose real name was Lawrence Frederick Cohen, was a longtime personality on CKVL radio and an original writer for the Suburban newspaper. His health deteriorated after he sustained a back injury last May. Fredericks was also the annual co-host of the Cummings Jewish Centre for Seniors Foundation Sports Celebrity Breakfast with son Mike Cohen, himself a sportswriter. He's also survived by wife, Elaine Cohen. The CJN's supplements coordinator, and son Chuck and daughter Lisa.

MUNICH — The head of Germany's Jewish community at a memorial ceremony for the Munich 11 lamented the "icy coldness" of the International Olympic Committee in refusing to mark the 40th anniversary of the massacre. Canadian Detained As IDF Deserter TEL AVIV — Yana Gorelik, a 30-year old Canadian-Israeli, got an unpleasant surprise when she arrived at Ben-Gurion Airport on Sept. 2: she was detained as a deserter from the Israel Defence Forces and spent four days in jail, missing her cousin's wedding.

Gorelik had moved with her parents to Canada at age 17 and had visited Israel several times over the last two years without a problem. Ma'ariv reported Aug. 29. But this time she says she was stopped and asked to sort out her official release from the IDF, but was then "humiliated" by being handcuffed and sent to a detention centre. In response to the incident, the IDF said that "Gorelik did not complete her exemption from military service in 2007 as requested by the IDF" and that failing to do so was legally considered desertion. All children born in Israel who lived there until age 15 are required to serve in the military unless they get an official exemption. Those who live abroad can complete an exemption process in their local embassies.

The army said she was incarcerated, served an indictment and judged like any other deserter. Gorelik, who lives in London, England, said Israeli consulates in both Canada and London had told her that because of her age, she didn't need to file an official exemption. TimesofIsrael.com

Canada severs diplomatic ties with Iran

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Signalling a new stage of diplomatic action against Iran, Canada suspended all diplomatic ties with the Islamic Republic last week.

A Sept. 7 statement by Foreign Minister John Baird said Ottawa had closed its embassy in Iran and declared "persona non gratae" all remaining Iranian diplomats in Canada.

Iranian diplomats were given five days to leave the country as of last Friday.

Canada views the Iranian regime as "the most significant threat to global peace and security in the world today."

Baird also blasted the Iranian regime's continued pursuit of nuclear weapons, its repeated calls for the destruction of Israel, its flagrant Holocaust denial, its abysmal domestic human rights record and its unabashed support of Syrian President Bashar Assad's ongoing attack on his own people, among other things.

"The Iranian regime is providing increasing military assistance to the Assad regime; it refuses to comply with UN resolutions pertaining to its nuclear program; it routinely threatens the existence of Israel and engages in racist antisemitic rhetoric and incitement to genocide; it is among the world's worst violators of human rights; and it shelters and materially supports terrorist groups, requiring the government of Canada to formally list Iran as a state sponsor of terrorism under the Justice for Victims of Terrorism Act," Baird said.

Canada also took the opportunity to list Syria as a state sponsor of terrorism.

"The Iranian regime has shown blatant disregard for the Vienna Convention and its guarantee of protection for diplomatic personnel. Under the circumstances, Canada can no longer maintain a diplomatic presence in Iran. Our diplomats serve Canada as civilians, and their safety is our No. 1 priority," Baird said.

Canada's surprise move came as the United States, Israel and Iran engaged in sabre-rattling amid an American naval deployment to the Persian Gulf that started late last month, fuelling more speculation that an attack by the West on Iran could be imminent.

In response to the U.S. naval deployment, Iran threatened to park its own naval fleet in international waters just off the U.S. coast, though no actual deployment schedule was given.

But speaking to reporters while in Russia for the Asia-Pacific Economic Co-Operation Summit on Saturday, Baird said "unequivocally, we have no information about a military strike on Iran."

Over the weekend, Iran called Ottawa's decision "hasty and unwise" and said it would react in the near future.

On Monday, the Iranian Mehr news agency quoted Hasan Sobhaninia from Iran's influential parliament committee on national security and foreign policy as saying that there "is the possibility" of other countries shuttering their embassies in Iran.

A NEW YEAR, A NEW BEGINNING

Rosh Hashana is traditionally a time to look back at the year just past. It is also a time of looking forward to a New Year... a new beginning.

May this New Year be one of peace. Peace of mind, peace of spirit, and may it bring peace and a new beginning to the people of Israel.

Ten years ago, The CJN asked a group of 20 prominent individuals to write about the books that most influenced them as they were growing up. We compiled their essays as the theme of the Rosh Hashanah supplement that year.

The supplement was very popular with our readers. We received a great many calls and requests for extra copies of the supplement. One reader even asked us to republish it as a specially bound commemorative volume.

We have renewed and revised that theme in this year's supplement. However, rather than ask about the books that influenced them, we asked a different group of prominent individuals to write about the people who influenced them.

The result is a revealing anthology of touching, deeply felt, personal reflections from a wide variety of thoughtful and thinking individuals of diverse backgrounds, ages, lines of work and geographies.

Not surprisingly, most of the authors pointed to family members as the key influences in their lives.

The eminent criminal lawyer Eddie Greenspan elegantly expressed what so many of us, too, might have written in response to the same question.

"Some teachers, politicians, actors, writers and a lot of regular people I have come into contact with throughout my life who caught my eye and who clearly have the ability to inspire, could have been my role model... But in terms of forming a vision for my own future, I cannot say that some stand out more than the rest – except for two people – my father and mother."

Prof. Ruth Wisse conveyed a similar thought in her reminiscence.

From the editor's desk...

The Rosh Hashanah supplement

"The influence of my home was so profound that I have almost always resisted other 'role models' or what are today known as 'mentors.'"

"Along the same lines, I have tried as a teacher to inspire appreciation for what was transmitted to me by my parents..."

But family members were not the only key influencers whose stories are written in the supplement. Our writers also pay tribute to teachers, activists and authors.

For example, renowned architect and philanthropist David Azrieli wrote about an elementary school teacher who instilled in him "the importance of being open to new experiences, new ideas and new challenges, and who sowed the seed for my deeply held belief in lifelong learning."

Common to all of the stories, however, is the not-so-remarkable fact that the people singled out for such tender commemorative tribute all embodied some aspects of qualities of courage, kindness, determination, compassion, a precisely honed sense of duty and responsibility, principled behaviour, empathy, a broad sense of human history, and an understanding both of human strength and of human frailty.

Of course, in telling us about the individuals who played such prominent roles in their lives, our group of writers also tell us quite a bit about themselves: how they were influenced, what were the purposes and higher causes that became their pursuits as a result of the influences, and who – and what – did they eventually become?

It soon becomes apparent that also common to the stories is a warmly conveyed, unselfconscious sense of gratitude from the writers to the many special individuals whose stories they tell.

Could there be a more appropriate time of year than this week – the eve of Rosh Hashanah – for doing so, for reflecting on who we are, for saying thank you?

But conveying gratitude is not only an activity of reminiscence. It arises each day as a result of acknowledging the good that others do for us. Thus, I must express the gratitude of the entire editorial team to our summer intern, Michelle Bitran. It was she who did the majority of the work in preparing this year's Rosh Hashanah supplement.

We hope you enjoy it.

The CJN also owes a debt of gratitude to Jeffrey Mills, who pointed out that, for many years, we had omitted to add the name of Majdi Halabi to the list on the editorial page of Israel Defence Forces soldiers missing in action. Halabi, a Druze from Daliyat el-Karmel in the Carmel mountain region of Israel, disappeared while on duty near Haifa on May 24, 2005. He was 19 years old then and declared missing in action on June 6, 2005.

Iran's nuclear program concerns Canada

'Diplomacy has failed,' says Baird

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Canada will work with the international community to ensure Iran does not acquire a nuclear arsenal, Canadian Foreign Minister John Baird pledged.

"We're deeply concerned about Iran's nuclear program," he told The C/JN in an interview Aug. 31 after addressing a forum sponsored by Community Connect, the young adult arm of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Asked whether Canada would support a pre-emptive Israeli strike on Iranian nuclear facilities, he deflected the question and said, "Every diplomatic effort should be taken to reverse Iran's course."

Speaking mainly to university-age students at the old Scotiabank building in downtown Toronto, Baird struck a sombre note, saying that talks designed to persuade Iran to stop the enrichment of uranium have not been successful.

"Diplomacy has failed," he said, referring to the three separate rounds of formal negotiations that have taken place between Iran and six world powers since April.

"We have no reason to believe that further talks will succeed," he added.

Baird described as "deeply, deeply disturbing" Iran's "bellicose rhetoric" on Israel.

Iranian leaders have repeatedly called for Israel's destruction.

Saying that the Iranian file is an "important priority" in Canada's foreign policy, Baird said the Canadian government understands the "awesome responsibility" Israeli leaders carry in defending Israel in the face of Iranian threats challenging its existence.

Arab states, too, fear Iran's acquisition of an atomic capability, he noted.

Beyond Israel and the Arab world, the world has a lot to fear from the spectre of a nuclear-armed Iran, he asserted. As he put it, "Iran is the greatest threat to peace and security today."

Although international sanctions against Iran have been "pretty effective," they have not affected Iran's behaviour, he conceded.

Saying that Canada has adopted a "strong and principled" policy on Iran with respect to its nuclear program and its record on human rights, Baird claimed that no national leader has been as tough on the Iranian regime as Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper.

Referring to Iran's nuclear program, he said, "The government of Iran is bringing on big problems for itself."

Switching gears, Baird, fresh from a trip to Israel, called Canada a "proud" and "good" friend of the Jewish state. "We stand by and with Israel. Being pro-Israel is doing the right thing."

Canada and Israel share the same values, including a commitment to the rule of law and democracy, he asserted, adding that Israel is the only "advanced democracy" in the Middle East.

Build a better world

The Torah reading for the first day of Rosh Hashanah tells of the birth of Isaac, his growth into young adulthood and the banishment of his older half-brother, Ishmael, from their father's tent.

The Haftorah on the first day describes Hannah's poignant plea for a son and of the birth of the boy who eventually grows up to become the prophet Samuel.

The Torah reading on the second day tells the perplexing story of the binding of Isaac. The Haftorah is a movingly eloquent, mere 18-verse passage by the prophet Jeremiah that connects the three previous readings into a heart-rending but forthright statement about our children and us, their parents. It evokes the image of the bitter tenderness of a mother's tears for her children. As translated by renowned American poet David Rosenberg, some of those verses are: "Rachel mourns her children/ refusing all comfort, all soothing/ all her hope gone blind/ her children gone/ yet these are the Lord's words/ your voice will cease its weeping/ your eyes brighten behind the tears/ that dissolve into a crystal-clear vision/ of the children alive/ returning home/ from the lands of enemies/ from beyond anguish to hope revived."

On Rosh Hashanah, the ancient sages deliberately direct our thoughts and our hearts to our children. The duty we have to the world, they are saying to us, is through our children. Think of the future of the world on this holiday, build it strong, make it better, the sages command us, so that our children will have the benefit of its goodness and of its vast beauty and – equally as important – so that they will see, learn and pass forward to their own children the example of caring for others they saw in their parents and grandparents.

At the very heart of the services, just before we read from the Torah and Haftorah, we chant the prayer Avinu Malkeinu. It delivers an enormous emotional wallop as a result of the combination of its stark poetry and its plaintive melody. It is probably one of the most familiar prayers of the holiday liturgy. "Our Father, our King, be compassionate with us, our children and our infants," we sobbingly plead of God.

And His answer to our plea perhaps is found near the end of Jeremiah's prophecy, again as translated by David Rosenberg: "Is Ephraim not my dear one/ says the Lord/ dear as an only child/ that whenever I speak of him/ I am filled with remembering/ and my heart goes out to him/ to welcome him back/ to receive him with love/ with mercy, says the Lord."

As we were once children and "received with love," it is we now, as parents and grandparents, aunts and uncles, friends and colleagues who must bestow love. But, as every parent knows, to love is to do. Words of love alone might be good in music. But they are not adequate in the real world. Without deeds – the myriad sacrifices, the sheer, hard work, sitting up all night with a child, the cool cloth against a fevered forehead, the song that soothes against nightmares, the hand that holds a worried child steady – words alone are empty measures in raising children. In the custodianship of God's world, we are all parents. And all the children of God's world are our children. For their sake, let us build a better world. Shanah Tovah.

Greeting from Ontario's premier

On behalf of the government of Ontario, I am delighted to extend warm greetings to the members of the Jewish community as you celebrate Rosh Hashanah.

In Ontario, we derive our strength and vitality from the cultural and spiritual diversity that makes up our great province. It is our wealth of culture that gives us our character and our heart – and strengthens our communities. Jewish Canadians are a dynamic and valued part of Ontario society and contribute greatly to the social, cultural and economic life of our province.

As you come together in celebration with family and friends on this joyous occasion – marking the start of the Jewish New Year – it is an ideal opportunity to reflect on the year that has passed and to look, with hope and optimism, to the year ahead. To all those observing Rosh Hashanah, Shanah Tovah! Please accept my best wishes for a wonderful new year filled with much health and happiness.

Criticizes reaction to church resolution

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) appears to have reacted to the United Church resolution adopted at its 41st General Council in anger and desperation far beyond what common sense dictates ("Community 'outraged' at United Church," Aug. 23; CIJA calls for input on United Church, Sept. 6). Most of those with whom I have discussed the "outrage in the Jewish community" at the church's decision, reflect a substantially more subdued point of view, in some of the following terms:

- What the church decides is its business, and in any event, it will have such an insignificant effect on Israeli commerce as to warrant a more intelligent reaction.
- What exactly did CIJA think it would accomplish by cutting off relations/boycotting the United Church? Exacerbating differences between our two communities solves exactly nothing!
- Open dialogue with the United Church needs to be increased. Perhaps some are still antisemitic, but it is doubtful all its members fall into that category. Better to broaden the lines of communication than cut them off completely.

Do we really want to return to the days of Rev. Al Forrest, who thought it important to advise me that some of his best friends were Jews? It was his editorial control of the United Church Observer that we questioned when he saw fit to publish antisemitic hate propaganda, and it was our intervention that led the United Church to remove that power from him. All that outrage enunciated by the CIJA is simply a waste of energy that could much better be utilized in creating better understanding and relations. What exactly will boycotting the United Church accomplish?

Need more singles events

Kudos to Linda Friedman, her committee and Toronto's Shaar Shalom Synagogue for initiating and hosting single events in the Jewish community ("Shul's singles committee serves the community," Aug. 2). Regrettably, there are limited initiatives on the part of the Jewish community in assisting singles in the 40-plus age group. Given the high rate of intermarriage, one would think there would be more of an attempt by Jewish organizations and institutions to support more programming. Sadly, this is not the case. I encourage more individuals, groups and shuls to rise to the challenge.

Two rabbis, two parties, two political philosophies

Daniel Treiman
JTA

Republicans and Democrats may not have much common ground this election year, yet their national conventions shared one feature: both gatherings were blessed from the podium by prominent American rabbis.

The Democrats had Rabbi David Wolpe, a bestselling author and leader of a prominent Conservative synagogue in Los Angeles. The Republicans had Rabbi Meir Soloveichik, a rising star within modern Orthodoxy and a regular contributor to conservative publications.

But beyond the kippot that they both wore on their heads and the Hebrew sprinkled through their addresses, the rabbis used their remarks to highlight very different themes. Indeed, each of their blessings spoke powerfully to the contrasting political ideologies of the parties that they were addressing. Rabbi Soloveichik, in his invocation to open the first full day of the hurricane-delayed Republican National Convention in Tampa, Fla., invoked themes that resonate deeply with Republicans — freedom, liberty, faith.

"We Americans unite faith and freedom in asserting that our liberties are Your gift, God, not that of government, and that we are endowed with these rights by You, our Creator, not by mortal man," said Rabbi Soloveichik, who has made common cause with religious conservatives on issues such as abortion.

His reference to the primacy of God over government, and the notion that our rights are derived from the former rather than the latter, garnered applause from the delegates at the convention, where many speakers went on to assail what they see as President Barack Obama's trespasses against religious liberty. Among the main sources of ire is the administration's application of the health-care reform law's birth-control-coverage mandate to employees of religious affiliated institutions — a policy that Rabbi Soloveichik himself had testified against before Congress.

More broadly, the finitude of government's rightful purview is an animating theme of conservative politics and a notion that Republicans think Democrats do not get. (Though when it comes to civil liberties and abortion rights, many Democrats would say the same about their GOP opponents.) Republicans lambasted a video shown at the Democratic convention asserting that "government is the only thing that we all belong to. We have different churches, different clubs, but we're together as a part of our city or our country or our state." Republican presidential nominee Mitt Romney responded on Twitter: "We don't belong to government, the government belongs to us."

In his closing exhortation, Rabbi Soloveichik hinted at the notion popular among conservatives that we are in danger of losing, and must recover, a proper understanding of liberty.

"And help all of us as Americans renew our dedication to the principle of God-gifted liberty, so America can remain a beacon of faith and freedom for generations to come," he said.

Rabbi Wolpe had a different focus in his benediction Sept. 5 in Charlotte.

Speaking to a largely empty convention hall after the roll-call vote to renominate Obama, Rabbi Wolpe acknowledged that America is "founded on the highest principles of freedom and resourcefulness and creativity and ever-renewed strength." But individual freedom, for him, is not the sum total of America's mission.

Indeed, Rabbi Wolpe immediately added, "And we understand that those worthy ideals stand alongside the commitment to compassion, to goodness, our sacred covenant to care for those who are bereaved and bereft, who are frightened, who are hungry, who are bewildered and lost, who seek shelter from the cold."

Our responsibilities are not only to ourselves, he suggested, and similarly our nation has obligations to the world as both a refuge and an example.

"As your prophet Isaiah has taught us, 'Shifru yatom, rivu almanah,' defend the orphan and fight on behalf of the widow," he said. "We know that our lamp is lifted not only to illuminate our way but [also] to serve as a beacon to others that here, this land, is a place where the dreams of a weary world flourish and endure." (Rabbi Soloveichik had referred not dissimilarly to America's calling as "a beacon of freedom to the world, and an ally of free countries like the State of Israel, an island of liberty, democracy and hope.")

Democrats, of course, have railed against the philosophy of hyper-individualism that they see as reflected in Republican vice-presidential candidate Paul Ryan's admiration for conservative author Ayn Rand and as embodied in Republican budget proposals. Former president Bill Clinton in his Democratic convention address painted this election as a choice between "a winner-take-all, you're-on-your-own society" and "a country of shared opportunities and shared responsibility."

While eschewing any overt partisanship, Rabbi Wolpe in his benediction made a similar distinction, noting the importance of community and hinting at the vulnerability of the lonely individual.

"You have taught us that we must count on one another, that our country is strong through community, and that the children of Israel, on the way to that sanctified and cherished land, and ultimately to that golden and capital city of Jerusalem, that those children of Israel did not walk through the wilderness alone," he said.

Liberty and community — the tensions between these values have long animated American politics and become pitched battle lines in the current elections. And they provided two rabbis with very different themes for their addresses to two very different parties.

Obama commits to Israel's security, unity on Iran

Ron Kampeas
JTA

CHARLOTTE, N.C. — U.S. President Barack Obama said America's support for Israel's security "must not waver" and the world must face the Iranian nuclear threat together.

"Our commitment to Israel's security must not waver, and neither must our pursuit of peace," Obama said to cheers Sept. 6, accepting the Democratic Party's nomination. "The Iranian government must face a world that stays united against its nuclear ambitions."

The party's convention had been dogged by headlines reviving reports of tensions between Obama and Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

The Democratic platform had removed language that recognized Jerusalem as Israel's capital and then restored it at Obama's behest. On Sept. 5, to boos from some delegates, the Democrats inserted a few lines into their platform affirming Jerusalem as Israel's capital.

Reports suggested Israel's government is more angry than ever by what it sees as Obama's refusal to make clear to Iran the consequences of not ending its suspected nuclear weapons program, including possible military action.

Two of the lines appeared in the 2008 party platform, but had been dropped for some reason when the platform was released Sept. 3. No one could explain the omission.

U.S. President Barack Obama

The removal prompted strong criticism from Republicans, including presidential nominee Mitt Romney, and from Democratic lawmakers in Congress, who said the removal of references to Jerusalem blindsided them. Pro-Israel groups also asked that the lines be restored.

"Jerusalem is and will remain the capital of Israel," stated the amendment that passed Sept. 5 when the party's platform committee met in Charlotte, site of this year's Democratic National Convention. "The parties have agreed that Jerusalem is a matter for final status negotiations. It should remain an undivided city accessible to people of all faiths."

Robert Wexler, a top Jewish surrogate for Obama's re-election campaign and a drafter of this year's platform, told JTA that Obama played a direct role in the Sept. 5 change. "The president directly intervened to make sure this amendment happened," he said.

The first two sentences appeared in the 2008 platform. The third satisfied longstanding demands from pro-Israel groups that Obama restate the pledge he made at the 2008

American Israel Public Affairs Committee annual policy conference that he is committed to an "undivided" Jerusalem.

Antonio Villaraigosa, Los Angeles' mayor and a chairman of the convention, faced a chaotic scene when he brought the committee's reconstituted language to the full floor for a vote. The amendment also restored the word "God" to the platform, after complaints from religious groups.

It took three voice votes to pass, and although Villaraigosa finally declared a two-thirds majority, it wasn't clear the amendment got majority support. Boos were audible.

The Republican Jewish Coalition's (RJC) director Matthew Brooks, the RJC's director, said, "To hear delegates on the floor of the Democratic convention strongly voice their opposition to recognizing Jerusalem as the capital of Israel, then boo when the chairman passes the resolution to adopt that language, is a shock."

An array of congressional Democrats had complained on Set. 4 and 5 about the removal of the Jerusalem language from the party platform, saying they were caught off guard.

Rep. Shelley Berkley, who is running for Nevada's U.S. Senate seat and is one of the most steadfastly pro-Israel Democrats in Congress, said she was disappointed, but added that she believes Obama's record on Israel overall is supportive, noting the enhanced U.S.-Israeli security relationship and Obama's efforts to push back in the United Nations against anti-Israel measures.

Let's take a deeper, nuanced look at our history

Memory, whether individual or communal, can be a fickle thing. What we remember is filtered through the lens of our own experiences. Just ask several people to describe an event, then compare one description with another. No wonder eyewitness accounts are viewed with caution.

Memory can make our lives richer, but it can also trick us, or worse, cast a glow of light (or darkness) over the past. It can give us a very distorted view of our shared history. On the other hand, truly understanding the past, with all its vagaries, gives us invaluable insight into our present.

When we in Vancouver began our Holocaust Documentation Project (well in advance of Steven Spielberg), our intention was to record on video the lives of survivors from our community. When no survivors remained to give first-hand accounts, we would have a record of the past for future generations.

We decided that the interview would not begin with the Holocaust years. We would make sure that viewers of these tapes would hear descriptions of survivors' lives before the Shoah. This would show that they had the same hopes and aspirations that all of us do, and that the rise of Nazism had disrupted families and communities that had existed long before that terrible watershed date of 1933.

We wanted people to remember that survivors' lives were rich and complex, that they were not just victims. The tapes would be witness not only to the horror, but to the fullness of life before darkness descended.

Jean M. Gerber
in Vancouver

and also to the strength of those who came through. Thus their stories would reflect the diversity of life in Europe before that dark time. To complete the circle, interviews would include accounts of survivors' lives after the Shoah.

Similarly, ideas of Jewish history are often distorted by time and by such popular dramas as Fiddler on the Roof, where there is much dancing and a pogrom, often creating a monolithic view of the past. And yet...

A recent weekly parashah dealt with how community life should be lived once the Israelites entered the land of Canaan. Our Shabbat study that week was a "constitution" written in 1756 by two nobles ruling the small Jewish community of Sugenheim. Each noble had six Jewish families under his control. This was not a code written by the Jews, but for them. It laid out in great detail not just what they owed the ruler, but how they should govern themselves.

For example: "No householder shall gossip in the synagogue... After the Eighteen Benedictions, one may speak when absolutely necessary, but idle talk is forbidden under threat of a fine of a quarter of a pound of wax for the Jewish treasury."

Never mind the gossip. The Jews were also fined if they didn't show up for services! (My daughter leaned over and whispered to me, "They were a frisky lot" – but that wasn't gossip, just an observation.)

This constitution was a small version of Frederick the Great's 1756 constitution for the Jews of Prussia, which set down a long list of requirements for his Jews. Through such documents, we learn that Jewish communities had a rich and varied life, and, notwithstanding the many restrictions, were able to prosper in many fields.

These regulations give us a nuanced picture of the life of Jews in central Europe, just on the cusp of the Emancipation. The community was a sturdy (if gossipy) community of businessmen and craftsmen. Not everyone was well off. Jewish beggars and thieves – of which there were many, often coming from the east after the massacres and expulsions – were not to remain in towns where protected Jews lived. The rulers' constitution mandated that such outsiders be hustled out after one night and a bit of bread.

As we learned through our interviews with survivors, before the rise of fascism, Jews in Europe were living in varied circumstances. Some still lived a shtetl life, while others in cities such as Warsaw, Berlin and Paris considered themselves fully accepted into the larger society. Jewish life in Europe was anything but monolithic.

I would suggest that we take a deeper look at our history, one that recognizes its nuances. The new year is a great time to begin that study as it truly was, with both its tragedies and its triumphs.

What does it mean to find one's destiny?

When couples used to get married in the "old country" people would say they met their bashert, their intended one. One can still hear that phrase in the religious community. Matchmakers are famous for promising to find one's bashert. Whether with help or on one's own, finding the right person is certainly difficult. There are so many challenges to couples and to family life today that being assured that one's partner is one's destiny is of tremendous value.

What does it really mean to find one's destiny?

I suppose it's considered ideal. It sure sounds good. This seems like a good season to reflect on what it actually means to find or rely on one's destiny.

Once you find a path that you feel is your destiny, do you stop working or worrying? Do you stop doubting? Do you never change paths?

If you find a job that fits and appears to be your destiny, you still have to work at it. Destiny doesn't mean no sweat. It also doesn't mean no doubts or changes. You may fit this particular task or skill set at this time, but not for all time. If we look at marriages, we might make similar observations. Even if you met your bashert, it may not be for all time, although we hope it is. But Judaism knows of divorce and allows for it. You must work hard to make a successful marriage, even with destiny on your side. And still it may not succeed. Thus, we say, if it isn't working out, get a divorce and start looking for a new destiny.

That is our life, and this is the message of our religion, too. If we understand destiny to be God's hand operating in our lives, then we must see it through all the twists and turns of life. God doesn't promise permanency. If we find someone to marry and say he or she is my bashert, that's the one God intended for me. But you still have to work at the marriage. One can't sit back and say, "OK God, make it work!" And if the relationship falls apart, no matter how good the beginning, nor how blessed, God's Judaism teaches us to get a divorce and start again.

That's our take on destiny, on God's hand in our lives. It gives us a start, but we must work at it and carry it through.

We can't avoid serious work. In every aspect of our lives, in human relationships as much as in daily living, we're charged with active effort. We must work in some capacity six days a week and rest only on the seventh. That is our destiny as God's creatures. Not to let others work so we can rest or study all our lives. The command to work is very clear in Genesis.

Norma Baumel Joseph
in Montreal

Many pray to God for improvement in their lives. I do, too. But I know that while my destiny may be in God's hand, if I don't do something about it, nothing will happen. How complex. Both human action and Godly intent are necessary. I always think of the joke of someone drowning and demanding of God in heaven, "Why didn't you save me?" God's answer: "I sent you a team of saviours with boats, but you refused, saying you were waiting for God!"

There are some religious Zionists who are opposed to the State of Israel. All agree that it's our destiny to have Zion. They claim we have to wait for God to act. (You can see where I'm going.) But God's intent is difficult to discern. The opportunity presented itself in the form of a UN vote and other world agencies agreeing with the concept of a Jewish state. They were like the above savours and boats. Was this our destiny, our time to declare a state and work toward the reality? Obviously the majority of the Jewish world, including the majority of religious Jews, believed that the time was suitable for the creation of a political entity.

Timing coupled with human exertion and emanating out of human trauma resulted in achievement. Israel exists because of the struggle of the Israeli people and the support of the Jewish people worldwide. That is our destiny. Many of us feel the hand of God.

Civilians will bear brunt of a war with Iran

Israeli cities and towns will most likely bear the brunt of Iranian retaliatory missile strikes should Israel unilaterally bomb Iran in an effort to destroy its nuclear facilities. This is not mere conjecture. In an increasingly bellicose war of nerves, Iranian leaders have issued shrill warnings to Israel to think twice before launching hostilities, even though, as Foreign Minister Ali Akbar Salehi claimed on Aug. 22, Iran treats Israeli threats as little more than futile exercises in psychological warfare. Nonetheless, Iran has issued a steady stream of blustery statements.

Mostafa Izadi, Iran's deputy chief of staff, has predicted that an Israeli strike would end in Israel's "collapse."

Mohsen Razaee, the former head of Iran's Revolutionary Guards air force, has asserted, "If the Zionists commit the folly and attack Iran, they will receive a crushing blow... which will lead to their annihilation." His successor, Amir Ali Hajizadeh, has said that an Israeli/Iranian war would give Iran reason to "get rid" of Israel "forever."

Avaz Heidarpour, a member of Iran's national security committee, has boasted that "all the Zionist regime's military centres will be destroyed completely on the very first day of the war, as they are a high-priority target for Iranian missiles."

A senior Iranian cleric, Seyed Reza Taqavi, has warned that "the heart of Tel Aviv" would be struck.

These threats were issued in response to a blizzard of media reports suggesting that Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Defence Minister Ehud Barak are prepared to order a preemptive attack on Iran in the near future.

The current tension begs the question whether Israel is really ready to deal with the prospect of Iranian reprisals.

Barak claims that a nuclear-armed Iran – which has repeatedly called for Israel's destruction and which provides material assistance to Hezbollah and Hamas, two of Israel's most potent enemies – would be far more dangerous to Israel than a strike itself.

Danny Yatom, the former director of the Mossad, dwelled on this theme at a conference on Iran earlier this year.

"As steep as the price for hitting Iran may be, a military strike on Iran will be less painful than the cost of living with an Iranian nuclear weapons threat," he said. "We have only two options: to let Iran get the bomb, or to use military force against their military nuclear program."

Yatom's hawkish view is at odds with Israeli leaders such as President Shimon Peres, who believes that Israel should not act unilaterally. Still others contend that a combination of international economic sanctions, cyber warfare against Iran's nuclear plants and assassinations of its scientists may well induce Tehran to step back from the brink.

At this juncture, however, Israel seems to be gearing up for a war with Iran, even though most Israelis oppose one.

The handwriting is already on the wall. Matan Vilnai, Israel's former home front defence minister, told Maariv last month that Israel is preparing for a 30-day war on multiple fronts. Aharon Zeevi Farkash, the former head of Israeli military intelligence, recently predicted that an Israeli strike on Iran is only weeks or months away. In August, Efraim Levy, the former director of the Mossad, declared, "If I were an Iranian, I would be very fearful of the next 12 weeks."

John Sawers, the head of Britain's M16 spy agency, lent credence to their observations by saying that an Israeli (or American) bombing campaign is inevitable, given Iran's determination to build a militarized nuclear arsenal and Israel's determination to nip it in the bud.

Shortly after Vilnai announced he was leaving his post to become Israel's ambassador to China, Netanyahu admitted that Israel has not invested sufficiently in home front defence. But he went on to say that Israel has developed an advanced warning system and thereby has readied itself for a missile onslaught.

Zeev Bielski, chair of the Knesset's subcommittee on home defence, disagrees with Netanyahu's upbeat tone. "The home front is not ready," he told JTA this past March. "We have made improvements over the situation in the Second Lebanon War in 2006, when the home front was completely unprepared, but the situation is not good."

In the aftermath of the 1991 Gulf War – during which two Israelis were killed by Iraqi Scud strikes and more than 200 were injured, mostly in Tel Aviv – a law was passed under which all new residential buildings must have a reinforced room capable of surviving missile and rocket attacks.

But two decades on, an estimated 1.7 million Israelis still have no access to such rooms, while 40 per cent of Israel's population have no gas masks to help ward off the effects of a chemical or biological attack.

In recent years, Israel's Home Front Command has been working on a plan to reinforce still more buildings. But as Gen. Aviv Kochavi, the current director of military intelligence, noted in a recent speech, Israel remains vulnerable. By his reckoning, some 200,000 rockets and ballistic missiles are aimed at Israel by its principal enemies: Iran, Hezbollah, Hamas and Syria.

During the Second Lebanon War, Hezbollah, an ally of Iran, fired nearly 4,000 rockets and missiles into Israel, causing havoc. Hezbollah, having acquired a stockpile of 40,000 rockets and missiles since then, would presumably fire many more rockets at Israel should it join forces with Iran in a war with Israel. Iran has a much more formidable rocket and missile capability than Hezbollah.

Israel is far from defenceless, having constructed, at great expense and with the financial and technical help of the United States, a battery of missile defence systems from the Arrow, which can intercept long-range missiles, to the Iron Dome, which can intercept short-range rockets. These missile and rocket shields, however, cannot fully protect Israel, as Israeli scholar Yiftah Shapir has indicated.

"The systems we have will cut down on the damage that missiles can cause," said Shapir, director of the military balance project at Tel Aviv University. "Some of these missiles will make it to Israeli population centres. Israel should be ready for a long period of attacks, perhaps even months, and this may bring commerce and other aspects of civilian life to a halt. Israel's major cities have never come under attack. This will be a very different and difficult experience for Israeli civilians."

Col. Adam Zussman, the commander of the Dan region in the Home Front Command, agrees with this bleak appraisal, having told Ha'aretz several months ago that Tel Aviv will be hit with a barrage of missiles should a war with Iran break out.

Israeli casualty forecasts vary. The Israel Defence Forces claims that no less than 300 Israelis will be killed in a war, but Barak's figure is 500. "It could be that there will be less casualties," said Vilnai, "but it could be that there will be many more."

Some 20,000 Israeli soldiers have fallen in the line of duty and thousands of Israelis have been killed in terrorist incidents in the past six decades. It goes without saying that, at a minimum, hundreds of Israelis will be added to that list should a war with Iran erupt.

CIJA reps meet with the king of Jordan

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Officials with the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) met with King Abdullah of Jordan in Amman last week to discuss how Canada can help the peace process and how it might ease the country's growing financial burden stemming from an influx of Syrian refugees into the Hashemite kingdom.

The Sept. 2 meeting was the result of a direct invitation by the king, according to CIJA CEO Shimon Fogel, who was part of the delegation.

He said the overture was received "in the summer" and that the king likely had developed an interest in CIJA through talks with Palestinian leaders. CIJA representatives met with Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas and other PA officials in June.

Also at the meeting were Jordanian Foreign Minister Nasser Judeh, CIJA chair David Koschitzky, and CIJA board members Steven Cummings and Morris Perlis, as well as Marc Gold, chair of Jewish Federations of Canada-UIA.

"CIJA is recognized as having a particular level of access to government. Often, other [political actors] have sought to get our help to advance their own interests, and I don't know that that was different" with Jordan, Fogel said.

Israel's Foreign Ministry and Canada's Department of Foreign Affairs both lent support to the meeting, CIJA said.

"King Abdullah engaged in a very open discussion about the challenges in the region, and in particular those faced by Jordan," CIJA said in a Sept. 4 statement.

"He noted that Jordan was carrying the economic brunt of the conflict in Syria. In particular, Jordan has been overwhelmed with almost 200,000 refugees, with an additional 100,000 expected. The cost – housing, food, school and medical care – is enormous and burdens an economy already strapped for cash, energy and water."

Shimon Fogel

Speaking to The CJA last week, Fogel said the king asked CIJA to relay a request for immediate and increased foreign aid and investment.

In June, Parliament passed the Canada-Jordan Economic Growth and Prosperity Act, establishing free trade between the two countries.

Asked why CIJA needed to act as a messenger when Jordan and Canada have amicable and open ties, Fogel said that countries always look "to secure support for their interests from whatever credible sources they can. And [Jordan] is of the view that if such a message were to come from CIJA, it would benefit from [Canada's] consideration."

"It's in that context that I think they were hoping we would weigh in in favour of Canada helping on both fronts," Fogel said, adding that CIJA isn't the only group helping Jordan relay messages to the West.

While Jordan had already asked Canada directly for assistance earlier this summer, Fogel said he believes King Abdullah was hoping to use CIJA's close relationship with Ottawa to help ensure it receives further support.

He said CIJA has conveyed the king's concerns and requests to Foreign Minister John Baird.

Rick Roth, a spokesperson for Baird, told The CJA that while Foreign Affairs has a "great, ongoing relationship" with CIJA, he would "not go into specifics" about discussions with the group.

"Our missions abroad facilitate many meetings between NGOs or Canadian businesses and foreign government officials," Roth said. "I will note that we contributed $6.5 million to Jordan on Aug. 11, to help meet the needs in responding to the ongoing crisis along the border."

Regarding Canada's role in revitalizing the peace process, Fogel said that while Jordan and Israel have an "excellent relationship" at the most senior diplomatic levels, the king rules over a population – half of which is Palestinian – that's not enamoured of the Jewish state.

"There's always been that paradox between the closeness of the upper-level diplomatic relationship" and the colder, grassroots, public one, Fogel said.

Since Canada has good relations with both Israel and Jordan, there are ways Israel and Canada can help Jordan both politically and economically, he said.

"There are two [domestic] areas in particular where Jordan is really challenged: water and energy," Fogel said.

Arrest warrant issued for philanthropist

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

A Jewish Canadian businessman who has been celebrated for his philanthropy and commitment to Jewish and Israeli causes has a warrant out for his arrest after failing to appear in a San Diego court for a pre-sentence hearing.

A warrant for Nathan Jacobson's arrest was issued July 30 by California Judge Irma Gonzalez after the 57-year-old Winnipeg native failed to appear in court for a hearing related to a case in which he pleaded guilty.

According to reports by Postmedia News and Ha'aretz, Jacobson and 17 others were indicted in 2006 by a grand jury in San Diego for their role with an online pharmacy called Affpower that shipped drugs from Costa Rica to Americans without legal prescriptions.

Jacobson laundered more than $46 million in drug payments through his Tel-Aviv-based credit card company, RX Payments Ltd., and then sent the money to bank accounts in Cyprus.

Although he pleaded guilty to money-laundering in 2008, the documents were sealed while Jacobson worked with American investigators.

But when he failed to appear at the pre-sentencing hearing – prosecutors were seeking jail time – Gonzalez unsealed the documents and issued an international warrant for his arrest.

Jacobson has not been seen since, and Postmedia News reported that he may have fled to Myanmar, formerly known as Burma.

In the four years since his 2008 guilty plea, Jacobson, who has dual Canadian-Israeli citizenship, still maintained his role as a high-profile player in Jewish community non-profit organizations.

Among other positions, he has been chair of the Canadian branch of Nefesh B'Nefesh, a post he held until 2010; has served on the boards of Tel Aviv University, the Tel Aviv Foundation, and the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee (CJPAC), and been honorary co-chair for a Canadian Friends of Hebrew University (CFHU) gala dinner.

In 2010, Jacobson was honoured at the annual Y Sports Dinner in Winnipeg for his commitment to the Jewish community.

In fact, Jacobson had committed to serve as campaign chair for the upcoming Mount Carmel Dinner at Toronto's Fairmont Royal York Hotel in November, hosted by the Canadian Friends of the University of Haifa, during which Jason Kenney, Canada's minister of citizenship, immigration and multiculturalism, is slated to receive an honorary degree.

Postmedia News reported that Jacobson, who donated to the Conservative party from 2007 to 2011, had become friendly with Kenney, as well as Foreign Affairs Minister John Baird, with whom he travelled to Israel.

Spokespeople for both ministers said they were unaware of Jacobson's indictment.

Following news about the arrest warrant, non-profit organizations where Jacobson had volunteered in the past were also quick to distance themselves from him.

Hetty Shapiro, executive director of Canadian Friends of University of Haifa, the organization hosting the dinner for Kenney, told The C/N via email, that her organization was "unaware of Nathan Jacobson's indictment, and he has since withdrawn as campaign chair. He is no longer involved with our organization or the upcoming dinner. Dr. Arnie Aberman is now the tribute committee chair."

Shapiro said she couldn't comment as to whether Jacobson had planned to commit funds to the organization or when he withdrew from the event.

CFHU's national communications director, Miriam Pilc-Levine, said Jacobson "served as the honorary co-chair of the 2011 Scopus Award Gala dinner in Winnipeg in support of fetal alcohol spectrum disorder research. Since his role was in an honorary capacity, he did not play an active role in the gala and was not in attendance at the evening."

CJPAC's communications director Tomer Chervinsky said, "While Mr. Jacobson was listed as a member of our advisory board for a short time, he was unable to participate in any of our advisory board meetings, and as such I can't provide much insight into this issue."

Jacobson often spoke to the media about growing up in poverty, the importance of his Hebrew school education, and his Jewish identity and Zionism.

Jacobson served in the Israel Defence Forces before he began amassing his fortune in the 1990s selling gasoline, cars and cigarettes in Russia.

He eventually went into construction and then moved on to the Internet pharmacy business, establishing MagenDavidMeds.com, a now-defunct Israeli online pharmacy, Ha'aretz reported.

He also ran Paygea, a credit card clearing company that handled payments for adult websites and gambling sites, which suddenly ceased operations in Israel last April.

Reform leader to make first visit to Canada

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Rick Jacobs will make his first visit to Canada since he became president of the Union for Reform Judaism in June, succeeding Rabbi Eric Yoffie.

The 57-year-old, now leader of the Reform movement's North American umbrella, will speak at Holy Blossom Temple Sept. 13 on "Change and Challenge: Reform Judaism at a Crossroads."

"I think for a host of reasons we're at a crossroads," Rabbi Jacobs said in a phone interview Sept. 5. "I think the Jewish community is at a crossroads... There are challenges everywhere we look."

His priorities include outreach beyond the confines of the synagogue, and engaging the next generation, he said.

A former dancer who explored Jewish themes as part of a Jewish modern dance company when he was an undergraduate in comparative religious studies in Israel, Rabbi Jacobs was a pulpit rabbi for almost 30 years. He served most recently at Westchester Reform Temple in Scarsdale, N.Y.

His installation service included movement meditation by a choreographer. "I really wanted to send a message that the synagogue and the Jewish community are places creative people should be exploring," Rabbi Jacobs said.

In his installation sermon, he said that Reform Judaism embraces "the best of both tradition and modernity, science and spirituality. Ours is the Judaism of autonomy, inclusiveness, creativity, passion, relevance and depth. We are the Judaism for a new era, and it's time we let the whole world know."

To that end, the URJ, which has almost 900 affiliated congregations in North America, including 25 in Canada, is creating a new website that is "really meant for the seeker - [for example] the young family thinking about Rosh Hashanah and wondering if there are some prayers we can say at our table."

Most often, he said, such seekers find websites representing more traditional Judaism, such as Chabad. But he believes that unaffiliated Jews "are looking for what we are about... They're looking for a connection."

Other aspects of his work include Israel - he noted that he's on the board of the Jewish Agency and has a small apartment in Jerusalem. "Much deeper Israel engagement" is a major goal of his.

"We're positioned to be able to deepen and strengthen the Zionist commitment of North American Jewry," he said. "I'd like to create multiple ways for people to connect to Israel."

A senior rabbinic fellow of the Hartman Institute, Rabbi Jacobs said that the sense of respect among the different streams of Judaism at the institute has become an important part of his rabbinic life.

Rabbi David Hartman, the Orthodox rabbi who founded the institute, taught Jacobs at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. "He inspired me to become a rabbi. He got me so excited about Jewish philosophy and text study."

Rabbi Jacobs also credits the Reform Jewish summer camp that he attended in California for conveying to him the "vitality" of Judaism, as well as his parents for teaching him "the value not only of hard work but a deep sense of integrity and ethics whatever you're doing... some of my deepest lessons as a person and as a person of faith."

Rabbi Jacobs - a native of New York whose family moved to California when he was 10 - said he is excited to travel to Toronto twice this fall. The second time will be in November, when he plans to visit local Reform congregations and the Leo Baeck Day School, and meet with Reform clergy and lay leaders.

"We're delighted by the strength of our Canadian congregations," Rabbi Jacobs said. "It will be an important part of my presidency to be in Canada." He expects to visit other Canadian cities after his trips to Toronto.

"With Canada playing a role as a broker or facilitator or bridge-builder between the two countries, it might help make it be more palatable" for Jordanians to do business with Israel in the future, he said.

Fogel was referring to the expected emergence of Israel as a major player in the energy sector following recent discoveries of large natural gas and shale oil deposits within its territory and offshore.

Canada has already indicated its willingness to help Israel develop technology and know-how in the sector once the resources are ready for extraction.

Fogel said the Jordanians showed CIJA how much it has cost to import the majority of their country's power from an unreliable Egypt, and that they're eager to find another energy source for their people.

"Having a stable supply of energy from Israel, providing [Jordan] could somehow package it in a way that didn't create more political problems than it solved energy problems... that would be clearly desirable," he said. "That's where Canada might be able to play a role."

Asked what specifically CIJA believed was accomplished by meeting with the Jordanians, Fogel said the results were "multifold."

"We got an incredibly insightful Jordanian analysis of everything going on in the region today," he said. "From Jordanian interior [issues] to Syria to the Arab-Israeli conflict, the Arab Spring, Iran and so forth. One can read about these issues in a newspaper or other media, but getting this kind of analysis directly from the horse's mouth is a valuable opportunity.

"We also had an opportunity to make [CIJA's] case on a number of issues as they relate to the Israeli-Palestinian deadlock as well as broader issues in the region, including Iran. So for us it was an opportunity to do what we're mandated to do, which is to advocate on behalf of Israel and to try and support and echo the case for Israel."

Fogel also noted that the trip to Jordan was arranged when most of CIJA's senior staff were already scheduled to be in the region, and that those individuals paid their own way to Amman.

Thornhill gearing up for cancer research run

Cara Stern
Special to The CJN

The annual Terry Fox Thornhill Community Run is coming up quickly. On Sept. 16, people from all around Thornhill will come together on the track at Thornlea Secondary School to raise money to be donated to the Terry Fox Foundation.

Last year, millions of people in Ontario ran, walked, rode and wheeled together, raising $12 million for cancer research.

This year, organizers are hoping to bring 500 people to the Thornhill run.

"Everybody has been touched by cancer, either in their own families or through someone they know," said Michelle Kofman, a volunteer in charge of media relations for the Thornhill run's organizing committee.

Registration forms are available for pickup all over Thornhill, Kofman said. They're in libraries, grocery stores, schools, community centres – just watch for them, she said.

People can even join in on the day of the run by registering at the start of the route in the back of the school. Additionally, forms will be handed out on Sept. 15 at the Thornhill Village Festival parade, Kofman said.

With no entry fee and no minimum donation, anybody can join in. There are three routes: two, five and 10 kilometres.

Kofman said the event is particularly special, not only because of the money it raises for cancer research but also because it is community-driven.

There will be activities for children, as well as a free barbecue with refreshments.

The run begins at 8 a.m., and continues until around 2 p.m. The first run begins at 8:30 a.m. sharp.

Water won't cause Mideast war: Israeli prof

Ron Csilag
Special to The CJN

A leading Israeli expert on water believes a war over the precious liquid is improbable.

Water "might be a trigger for conflict. It might cause tension. Western experts see the potential for conflict. But none of the wars in the [region] were caused by water," says Prof. Eilon Adar.

"Based on the Middle East experience, I can say [war over water] is very unlikely."

Besides, if water is scarce in the region – and it is – Israel simply makes more of it, said Adar, director of the Zuckerberg Institute for Water Research at Ben-Gurion University of the Negev.

"In Israel, we already consume, by far, more water than God provides us with," Adar told The CJN in an interview prior to his talk last week at the Lodzer Centre Congregation. "So we create more water."

Using innovative technologies, Israel does this by recycling water through sewage treatment and by desalinating both seawater and saline ground water.

In 2012, Adar said, Israel will desalinate about 400 million cubic metres of water at a cost of some $200 million. Sewage treatment, he said, costs roughly the same.

Having coped with decades of water shortages, Israel has gained tremendous experience in developing unique solutions for water issues, Adar said.

The nation recycles 82 per cent of the sewage produced by Tel Aviv and its suburbs.

That water is treated and used in the agricultural sector, including irrigation.

Seventy per cent of Israel's drinking water comes from groundwater reservoirs and 30 per cent from the Mediterranean.

And the message of conservation seems to have gotten through in Israel, he said. Total per capita water consumption is about 500 cubic metres per year (by contrast, Canadians use 1,600 cubic metres of water per person per year).

"Nobody in the world gets close to us regarding water-use efficiency," Adar noted.

That's especially true in the agricultural sector, he added. In Israeli greenhouses, which account for most of the country's intensive agriculture, "irrigation efficiency" sits at between 85 and 92 per cent.

"That means that 85 to 92 per cent of water is consumed by the plant," Adar pointed out.

About two-thirds of water used in farming is reclaimed sewage water, 25 per cent is fresh and about seven per cent is brackish, or salty. Certain crops – tomatoes, melons and asparagus – thrive on saline water.

"Our farmers managed to show everyone that you can do more with less," Adar said.

A hydrologist who's headed BGU's Zuckerberg Institute for Water Research since 2002, Adar tries to steer clear of politics. He calls water "a commodity," but knows how explosively political it can be.

He scoffs at Palestinian claims that Israel is stealing water from the West Bank.

"What does that mean, to steal? Every major water resource in the Middle East is cross-border," Adar pointed out. Besides, he added, water naturally flows from the West Bank across Israel toward the Mediterranean.

According to the Zuckerberg Institute, all groundwater reservoirs in the Middle East are shared by at least two countries: Israel and Jordan (Arava aquifers); Syria, Israel and Lebanon (Jordan River resources), and Israel and the West Bank (Judean and coastal aquifers).

Such is the significance of water in the Middle East that it's prominent in all existing peace treaties, the facility stresses.

Adar pointed out that the only still-functioning committee of the otherwise failed Oslo peace accords with the Palestinians is the one dealing with water.

"By all practical means, Israel and Palestine agree on water issues. But the difference is, the Palestinians say, let's sign the agreement on water. Israel says no, the water will be part of a comprehensive peace treaty. We agreed on water issues with Jordan years ago."

Adar said Palestinians have called on Israel to supply them with an additional 300 million cubic metres a year, at roughly $175 million annually. He thinks it's worth it. "Do I have to tell you how much one day of a war costs?"

He doesn't blame Palestinians for failing to expand their own water resources.

"Their hands are tied. Israel still says that unless a peace treaty is signed to include water issues, we control the West Bank." Even in areas controlled by the Palestinian Authority, its water authority can develop resources only with Israel's consent.

As for improving the quality of water they have, Adar said Palestinians "do almost nothing."

"It's a very delicate issue, and we have to reach an agreement on how to co-operate and manage and develop this cross-border common water issue."

Former teacher charged with sexual assault

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Toronto police are asking victims of an alleged pedophile who worked in a Jewish day school and summer camp to come forward.

In a news release, Toronto Police Services said Heshi Nussbaum, 71, had been charged with "indecent assault male."

The alleged sexual assaults took place between January 1972 and December 1975.

Police believe there may be more victims and are asking anyone with information to contact them.

"It is alleged that the accused [Nussbaum], while working as a teacher in a private religious school in the Bathurst Street/Steeles Avenue area, sexually assaulted a 12-year-old boy at the school and during a summer camp."

"Police believe there may be more victims."

Rabbi Dan Rand, executive vice-president of Eitz Chaim Schools, acknowledged that Nussbaum worked as a teacher at the school in the early 1970s. "After an investigation, we can confirm that to the best of our knowledge, at no time did a complaint or allegation come from a student or parent at the school," he said.

Nussbaum was let go when the school heard "allegations from a camp that was unaffiliated with the school."

"When we heard of the allegations, he was terminated," Rabbi Rand stated.

Anyone with information is asked to contact police at 416-808-3205, Crime Stoppers anonymously at 416-222-TIPS (8477), online at www.222tips.com, text TOR and a message to CRIMES (274637), or leave a tip on Facebook.

Similarity in schools' names causes confusion

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

It happens all the time, according to Joan Schoenfeld, principal of the Downtown Jewish Community School (DJCS).

"It" refers to confusion between her school and the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School, both of which are located in the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre (MNJCC) on Spadina Avenue at Bloor Street.

The two schools have received each other's invoices, deliveries, and even calls from teachers looking for jobs, said Schoenfeld, who has been principal of the supplementary school since its inception in 1979.

Until the Downtown Jewish Day School (now the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School) was founded in 1998, DJCS (the supplementary school) was the only school in the building. The initials of the two schools – DJCS and DJDS – only added to the confusion. Their respective websites are djcs.org and djds.ca.

But the supplementary school appears to be a well-kept secret. "No one knows about it!" said DJCS' marketing manager Jo Michaels.

Joan Schoenfeld, principal of the Downtown Jewish Community School

Schoenfeld – who has a master's degree in educational administration from the University of Toronto and a principal's certificate from the Jewish Theological Seminary – recalls that the school was established after Jewish Family & Child Service (now Jewish Family & Child) conducted an outreach project in the mid-1970s.

At the time, she said, there was almost nothing Jewish at the JCC's southernmost branch, and there was no Jewish school downtown. "The Jewish community at that time was moving north."

But a JF&CS survey to learn about the downtown Jewish community showed that a lot of young families – many from outside the city – had moved downtown and didn't know what Jewish resources were available to them, she said.

Schoenfeld, who had moved here with her husband from Baltimore in 1970, fit the demographic. She ended up chairing the education committee that resulted from the survey.

By the late 1970s, her children were school age. Rachel, now a rabbi at a Reconstructionist congregation outside Boston, and Devorah, now a Jewish studies professor in Chicago, were among the new school's early students.

Josh Matlow, Toronto city councillor for Ward 22, St. Paul's, is also an alumnus, Schoenfeld said. By coincidence, he spoke at the MNJCC Sept. 5, the day Schoenfeld spoke to The CJN.

The school – which is egalitarian and has more than 150 students from junior kindergarten to Grade 7 – has always been pluralistic and diverse, Schoenfeld said. Families range from secular to traditional, and parents include interfaith and same-sex couples.

Unlike many supplementary schools, DJCS is not affiliated with a synagogue, but it partners with the First Narayever Congregation, Shir Libeynu and the Annex Shul.

As well, students receive a free MNJCC membership, and the school offers joint programs with the JCC and other downtown organizations.

New Year's holidays offer a universal message

JTA

The start of the Jewish New Year, the month of Tishrei, is filled with holy days, among them four foundational celebrations: Rosh Hashanah, Yom Kippur, Sukkot and Simchat Torah-Shemini Atzeret. They are quite different from one another. Yet we may also think of all four holidays as two pairs of two. The first two – the day of memory and accounting and the Day of Atonement – are awe-inspiring and grave compared with the last two festivals, which are days of joy.

At the same time, the first three holidays do have a common denominator: As much as they are Jewish holidays, they carry a universal message. Embedded within them are three of humanity's cardinal touchstones: accounting and judgment; mercy and atonement; and the joy of life.

These attributes and qualities are essential to the lives of every human being. We mark the new year by commemorating creation on the one hand and celebrating the Kingship of the Lord on the other. Both creation and God's sovereignty pertain to all humankind and are not specifically Jewish.

The Day of Atonement, too, is relevant to every human being. Life is full of mistakes and transgressions. Without atonement it would be unbearable to go on living with the unresolved and painful pieces of our past.

Sukkot at first glance seems to be far more connected with Jewish history. Yet at its essence, the holiday is actually a festival of thanksgiving for what we have. We acknowledge the tranquility in our lives and express our gratitude for Divine gifts.

Moreover, our sages teach us that during Sukkot – in the days of the Holy Temple – 70 bulls were offered to God in the name of the 70 nations of the world. As the prophet Zachariah foretells, in the days to come it is on Sukkot that all the peoples of the world will come as pilgrims to the Temple in Jerusalem (14:16-21).

This combination of the particular and the universal is not just one more interesting point; it is the key for understanding the meaning of these three holidays. In all our other celebrations, and perhaps in Jewish religious life in general, we stress the specificity of Jewish existence. Most of our holidays and memorial days are deeply connected with our own history.

In Tishrei, however, we focus on our fundamental humanity, on the fact that we are human beings with great problems. In this context, humanity is not defined as a group of human beings. Here we speak of our basic humanity – humanity as a quality. The very touchstones that we mark in Tishrei are what make us human. The essence of the universality of these holidays, then, is not in the point of sharing with others, it is in delving into ourselves in order to reveal and find some of the fundamentals of our existence. We explore and acknowledge what is universal to all humankind within our own selves.

The fourth and last of the holidays of Tishrei, Shemini Atzeret (and with it Simchat Torah), stands in clear contrast to the first three. As beautifully depicted by our sages, the king made a great banquet to which he invited all the citizens of his realm. At the end of these feasts, he called his most beloved friend and said now that all these big events are over, let us have a small banquet just for the two of us (tractate Sukkah 55b).

A call to help refugees

Legislative changes concern Jewish professionals

The day before Canada Day, the federal government made several drastic changes to Canada's policies towards refugees.

The first made it possible for immigration officials to discriminate against refugees based on their country of origin or mode of arrival. The second eliminated access to life-saving medications for almost all refugees through the Interim Federal Health Program. The third, when it comes into effect, will eliminate access to health care for refugees from "designated" countries almost completely.

We are physicians and the head of a leading hospital department who treat refugees. We are refugee lawyers, professors of immigration and refugee law and former members of the Immigration and Refugee Board.

As the high holidays approach, we want to share our perspective as professionals, and as Canadian Jews. And we want to issue a call to action. As you read on, you will see why.

On June 30, all refugee claimants and many refugees were cut off from receiving life-saving medications like insulin through the Interim Federal Health Program. This includes children.

It gets worse. In the next few months, Jason Kenney, the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, will release a list of designated "safe" countries (DCOs). Refugees from DCOs will be refused even emergency, life-saving care. They will also have their refugee hearings fast-tracked, and will not have the right of appeal.

While we object to DCO countries in general, we take particular exception to the inclusion of Hungary—a country Minister Kenney has made clear will be on the list. As documented by the Simon Wiesenthal Centre and other human rights organizations, Hungary is extremely dangerous for minority groups. Some of us have personally worked with Roma families who faced violence there and would again were they forced to return.

If all this weren't cruel enough, refugees can now be named "irregular arrivals" at the discretion of the Minister of Public Safety. Irregular arrivals will be detained for up to one year, including children 16 and over. Children under 16 will be separated from their families, or kept in detention with their mothers.

These measures have inspired a national outcry from health providers, faith groups, community groups, students and virtually all major Canadian medical bodies including the Canadian Medical Association and the College of Family Physicians of Canada.

The reaction from Jewish Canadians has also been strong and swift. The Toronto Board of Rabbis spoke out, as did the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre and multiple Jewish leaders. Even Elie Wiesel weighed in, saying, "Today, as yesterday, a nation is judged by its attitude towards refugees."

Apparently, our voices weren't loud enough. That is why we are appealing to you today. As you read this, a refugee is not being followed for a serious cancer with a high recurrence rate. Soon, a family will be forced back to Hungary to face violence.

Right now, many of us will be thinking about how to have a positive impact on the world. Individual acts of charity are important. Even more important is helping to build a society where charity is no longer necessary, because there is justice for all.

Please take a moment to contact your member of Parliament. Call, email, set up a meeting. Tell them you want to see the cuts to refugee health care reversed. Let them know you do not want to see our government discriminate against people based on their country of origin or mode of arrival.

As the holidays approach, let the Canadian government hear the voices of Canadian Jews.

Israel & Overseas / National Collective Responsibility

Since the creation of the State of Israel in 1948, United Jewish Appeal of Greater Toronto has been strengthening and transforming the lives of Israeli men, women and children by investing in vulnerable Israeli communities and assisting new olim with the transition to their new home. The information below illustrates how donations made to UJA's 2012 Annual Campaign break down, and how by working in partnership with other agencies, and with the generosity and vision of our donors, UJA continues to stand with the people of Israel. In fact, this year alone, UJA has allocated $16,930,109 for the people of Israel and overseas communities, and for national programs and services.

For almost 75 years, JAFI's prerogative has been the resettlement of the Jewish people in the State of Israel. Since 1989, the agency has facilitated the assimilation in Israel of over one million new immigrants. Today, JAFI continues to provide integral services in Israel and to the international Jewish community. JewishAgency.org

In partnership with JAFI, UJA has been instrumental in:

- Expediting aliyah for those who've decided to move to Israel
- Absorbing thousands of Ethiopian Jews across the country
- Focusing on the needs of assailable Jewish populations worldwide

Special Toronto partnerships

- In order to strengthen our alliance with JAFI, UJA has initiated three unique partnerships focused on youth-at-risk with the Israeli municipalities of Bat Yam, Eilat/Eilat and Sderot
- UJA is able to improve the socio-economic landscape of Israeli society via educational, vocational and health service programs
- UJA has partnered with JAFI on the MAKOM Young Emissary Israel Engagement Program

AMERICAN JEWISH JOINT

Opening a new gate

Rabbi Yehoshua Weber

For me, the haunting climax of the High Holidays occurs with that heartfelt end-of-Yom Kippur request: "Open unto us a gate at the time of closing of gates for the day is fast waning." Please. Just one more chance before this year's gates of prayer are irretrievably, irrevocably closed.

But when you pray, you wonder, don't you, if there is an additional component to this prayer. You wonder if the prayer is not only about gates that are now closing but also about gates that have yet to be opened. Might this be a prayer for God's assistance in opening new gates and in conquering new vistas? "Open for us a (new) gate, at the time of the closing of (old) gates, for the (old) day is departing." This ability to open new doors is one of life's most important skills. Life, even it's most stable form, is a continuous progression of periods and experiences, with the doors and experiences of one period closing as the doors and the experiences of the next period open. Please, we ask God, help us progress. We treasure what was. With the dawn of a new year, please help us appreciate and develop the new treasures of a

The ability, or lack thereof, to open new gates, was crystallized for me by a rabbinic peer who shared the following story. This rabbi knew a set of parents who had lost an only son in the American army during World War II. The rabbi, who was then a young man, would visit the mother and attempt to assuage her grief. During these visits, the mother invariably showed him her dead son's room. "See?" she would swer was an absolute no. She was impervious to any discussion about how mutually beneficial the relationship would be to her and her husband and to the survivor.

This is our story, isn't it? Many of our personal "gates" have closed. People who were dearer to us than life itself may have passed away, leaving us dazed by the enormity of their absence. But other gates remain open – friends and relatives who are still with us.

Moreover, new doors leading to new relationships might be opening as well. For example, we might have retired from jobs that gave structure and focus to our days, but new doors of study and volunteering might beckon.

"Psach lanu sha'ar be'er ne'ilat sha'ar ki fana hayom," "Open unto us a gate at the time of closing of gates for the day is fast waning." Let us maximize whatever opportunities God sends our way this New Year. They may indeed be new gates.

A shanah tovah and a sweet new year to all.

Rabbi Weber is spiritual leader of Clanton Park Synagogue in Toronto.

Rabbinic Reflections

say. "It is the same as it was. It will always remain exactly the way my son had left it."

The rabbi had also become acquainted with a young Holocaust survivor who, alas, had no relatives in North America. The rabbi told the bereaved mother about this boy and about his need for a home and suggested that the bereaved parents welcome the boy into their home and perhaps turn their deceased son's room into a living space of this survivor.

The mother's instantaneous an-

Putting dead money to work

Bank of Canada governor Mark Carney recently called on Canadian corporations to start spending the more than $500 billion of cash, "dead money" as he called it, sitting on their balance sheets. "Their job is to put money to work, and if they can't think of what to do with it, they should give it back to their shareholders."

Not surprisingly, corporate Canada disagrees with this assessment, arguing that due to economic uncertainty, companies need to keep large cash reserves. Furthermore, some argue that they're actually gathering cash to have the capital needed to make large investments in the future.

Carney has the interests of Canada as a whole in mind, whereas individual firms make decisions based on the best interests of their corporate stakeholders. Usually, these two differing motivations – making money and serving the public – coincide, but in this case, it appears the opposite is true. Governments can "solve" this problem by, say, lowering tax rates on dividends or taxing "excess" cash, which might change the calculus of individual companies.

Money Matters
Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

tion, becomes out of reach for the average Jewish family, we risk a "depression." Despite the growth of the general Jewish community here in Toronto, enrolment in Jewish schools is now contracting.

While it might be argued that corporate investments delayed for a few years may eventually yield greater results, no such argument can be made for our lack of investment today in Jewish education. Unlike the economy, with its normal cycles of growth and recession, Jewish life not nurtured in the formative years is not something we can generally recover from. The uneducated Jew of today is the indifferent Jew of tomorrow, and the vanishing Jew of the future. If we don't invest today in our most precious assets – Jewish children – there will be fewer and fewer Jewish grandchildren and great-grandchildren to invest in.

Like Carney, I'm frustrated. Free access to education is a fundamental right of every child and a fundamental responsibility of every community. Every government in the world understands that, yet somehow when it comes to Jewish education, this basic notion is ignored. Whereas previous generations may have argued they could not afford to do so, such arguments ring very hollow today. We are by far the wealthiest generation of Jews in history. Yet we are also likely the most ignorant of all when it comes to Jewish history. If only a small part of the billions of dollars already sitting in Jewish charitable foundations would be put to work today, the tuition crisis would be solved overnight, ensuring the sustainability and growth of our community.

Engaging anthology falls short of dust-jacket vow

Last year, Jewish Lights published a thoughtful read-er, All These Vows, edited by Rabbi Lawrence A. Hoffman. It consists of 37 short essays written by scholars and rabbis from all Jewish denominations (with a preponderance of Reform Jews) about Kol Nidrei, perhaps the most evocative prayer in the Jewish liturgy. As anyone who attends synagogue on Yom Kippur eve knows, whenever a cantor or choir begins to intone its haunting melody, many eyes well up with tears.

Ironically, Kol Nidrei may also be the most controversial prayer in the Jewish prayer book. Its origin is unclear: it was unheard of in talmudic times. It presumably arose as part of Jewish folk religion some time before the 10th century. We know for sure that it existed then because some of the greatest rabbis of the time spoke out against it. Some went so far as to refer to Kol Nidrei as a "foolish custom" (minhag shrtut) and tried to abolish it.

Kol Nidrei is essentially a formulaic annulment of vows. The Bible says a great deal about the importance of fulfilling vows, but provides no rules for their annulment. The Mishnah and Talmud do provide detailed rules for appearing before a rabbinic court and presenting grounds for requesting a vow's annulment. According to Halachah, annulments of vows are not automatic; courts accept only some grounds.

Accordingly, the earliest opposition to Kol Nidrei was based on the well-founded halachic argument that this putative annulment text so solemnly chanted does not work. The prayer persisted nonetheless. In the 12th century, leading northern French rabbis, realizing that they could not uproot the prayer, proposed a slight emendation to the text of Kol Nidrei to reduce, but not eliminate, the halachic problems. The prayer until then had annulled vows of the previous year retroactively ("from last year's Yom Kippur until this year's"). They proposed a change to a forward-looking declaration. This new text, despite its grammatically indefensible mix of tenses — kol nidrei... dinedarna... mi-yom kippurim zeh ad... ("all the vows that we vowed [sic] from this Yom Kippur until the next") — has been the standard formula in Ashkenazi circles for the last 800 years.

Rabbi Hoffman's book has only a cursory discussion of the early years of controversy surrounding Kol Nidrei. But some of the essays in the book tell the fascinating story of the renewed controversy about it in the past 200 years, when again serious attempts were made to remove it from our liturgy. Early Reform rabbis were adamantly opposed to it. Some, like Rabbi Abraham Geiger (1810-1874), composed alternate prayers, reproduced in this book, for example, asking God to grant us strength to fulfil our vows. Rabbi Samson Raphael Hirsch (1808-1888), the founder of German neo-Orthodoxy, also eliminated Kol Nidrei from his synagogue's practice.

Much of the modern opposition to Kol Nidrei was an outgrowth of or reaction to Christian criticism. Anti-semites often argued (some still do) that Jews are untrustworthy: they allegedly gather in their synagogues on the holiest day of their year to declare all their promises null and void. Jews repeatedly explained, to little avail, that Kol Nidrei is designed to absolve us of culpability only for vows we make to God and are too weak to follow through on, not for failing to live up to promises made to other human beings. Those cannot be annulled by a formula chanted by a cantor.

One of the most curious stories told in this book, in an essay by its editor, is of the controversy surrounding the publication of the 1945 edition of the American Reform movement's official Union Prayer Book. No one has figured out how Kol Nidrei made it into the printed version of that prayer book, apparently against the decision of the editorial committee.

Jewish embarrassment with Kol Nidrei persists until today. Even the authors of some of the essays in this book confess that they felt uncomfortable when asked to write what Kol Nidrei meant to them. Others admitted that the music always meant more to them than the words. The most irreverently titled essay in the collection is "How is Kol Nidrei Like a Dodgers Game?" by Prof. Ron Wolfson of California. (Answer: It's the spectacle surrounding the Dodgers' game that's more interesting than what is happening on the field, and the spectacle surrounding Kol Nidrei that is more moving than what is being chanted on the bimah.)

A fascinating essay by Rabbi Marc Saperstein documents how in the mid-20th century, a few prestigious American rabbis, both Reform and Orthodox, claimed in their sermons that the vows that Kol Nidrei was originally meant to absolve were the commitments made by Converso Jews in medieval Spain who had promised under duress to begin practising another religion. Surely if this claim were true, it would make Kol Nidrei more appealing. Sadly, Rabbi Saperstein proves that it is not.

My biggest disappointment with the book is that, in my estimation, it fails to live up to the promise on its dust jacket that it will reveal "the secret of [Kol Nidrei]'s magical appeal." The book does succeed, though, in presenting the enigma of Kol Nidrei and its challenge. And it has some inspiring essays, such as the one written by Canadian-born Prof. Wendy Zierler, who admits that her essay is really about the power of vows fulfilled and how they affected her own family history.

Certainly one message of Kol Nidrei is that vows are powerful and therefore frightening. A prayer recited on the eve of Rosh Hashanah puts it well: "I fear that I may stumble and be trapped, heaven forbid, in the sin of vows and oaths." Kol Nidrei teaches us how seriously Jews take their vows — in fact, the opposite of what antisemites claim.

May 5773 be a year of good health, spiritual growth and peace for us all. May it be a year when we succeed in observing the teaching of the talmudic rabbis: "Let your 'yes' always be true and your 'no' always be true."

MONTREAL — The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) is trying to allay concern about the election of a Parti Québécois (PQ) minority government headed by Pauline Marois with the reminder that the Jewish community has cultivated good relations with the party over the years.

CIJA's vice-president for Quebec, Luciano Del Negro, said that PQ governments in the past showed generosity and sensitivity to the Jewish community and that many individual members can be counted on as steadfast friends.

The PQ government elected Sept. 4 is the fifth since 1976.

Del Negro acknowledged that the PQ's weak grip on power, with 54 of the 125 National Assembly seats, should temper Marois' drive for a quick referendum on sovereignty, tougher language laws, and "identity" projects, such as the "charter of secularism."

"Quebecers have proved to be incredibly wise," he said, "No one has been given a blank cheque... There's no need to panic."

He noted that the total popular vote for sovereigntist parties — the PQ, Québec solidaire (QS) and the new Option nationale, was well under 40 per cent.

Del Negro feels that it's unhelpful to brand Marois as xenophobic or fanning xenophobia because of such proposed measures as banning public employees from wearing obvious religious symbols, except those that are Christian.

"It's counterproductive to start tagging people, even when some of their positions are quite severe. It doesn't allow us to dialogue with people. Circling the wagons doesn't enable us to carry on a civilized debate," he said.

Del Negro said the community should seize the opportunity the premier-elect has presented. "I think Madame Marois extended a hand [to anglophones in her victory speech] and we should take it, not smack it down."

Del Negro noted that he was told by senior party officials that Marois had planned to reach out similarly to "ethno-cultural communities" had her speech not been disrupted by deadly violence. Regarding her history with the Jewish community, Del Negro said that Marois, and most of her caucus, attended a wine-and-cheese reception this past spring that CIJA held at the National Assembly, and that she publicly condemned QS MNA Amir Khadir's participation almost two years ago in the picketing of a St. Denis Street store for selling Israeli-made shoes. The PQ supported a motion last year denouncing that boycott, but it was never debated, because Khadir withheld his assent.

CIJA, speaking on behalf of the organized Jewish community, and B'nai Brith Canada issued statements congratulating the PQ on its win.

'Strong channels of communication with PQ'

"Over the years, we have established strong and open channels of communication between the Jewish community and the PQ, and look forward to continuing a respectful and constructive dialogue between the Jewish community and the new Marois government," stated Del Negro, while paying tribute to outgoing premier Jean Charest.

B'nai Brith national president Eric Bis-ell stated: "As Canada's senior human rights advocacy organization with a long-standing presence in Quebec, we look forward to working with the new government and all members of the National Assembly to promote values of importance, not just to the Jewish community, but to all Quebecers."

CIJA also deplored the shooting that occurred at the PQ's victory celebration at the Metropolis concert hall, which resulted in the death of one man and the wounding of another.

"Our community is horrified by this act of senseless violence which has darkened an exemplary democratic exercise that all of we Quebecers have carried out peacefully and with respect for the political diversity of our society," stated Del Negro, who was present when the incident occurred.

CIJA said that it's "saddened" to see the re-election of Khadir, the QS' sole MNA, in the Plateau Mont-Royal riding of Mercier. Besides the St. Denis protest, Khadir has been outspoken in his criticism of Israeli policies, took part in a nakba demonstration last year and has expressed sympathy for Hezbollah and Hamas.

Three years ago, the then new left-wing QS, passed a resolution endorsing the boycott campaign against Israel.

Khadir, his party's co-spokesperson, easily kept his seat, beating his nearest PQ rival by two votes to one. This was despite a determined campaign against him waged by the anti-boycott Les Amis québécois d'Israel and its leader, Daniel Laprès, who said he was voting PQ for the first time to keep Khadir out.

The QS' other spokesperson (a term the party prefers to leader), Françoise David, was elected for the first time and by a wide margin in Gouin, an area taking in Little Italy.

QS candidate Manon Massé, who was aboard the Canadian boat that tried to enter Gaza last year, came within less than 2,000 votes of the PQ victor in Sainte Marie-Saint Jacques, the riding in which the boycott-targeted Naot and Le Marcheur shoe stores are located.

Province-wide, however, support for the QS is at less than six per cent.

CIJA has sought good relations with all parties, except the QS, and Del Negro said that stand won't change until it modifies its "hostile" views on Israel. "The ball is in their court," he said.

One of the first candidates to be declared elected in the province, within minutes of the polls closing, was Liberal Lawrence Bergman in D'Arcy McGee, the only Jewish MNA, who garnered 85 per cent of the ballots. At 71, he is beginning his sixth term.

His nearest opponent, Sophie Le-roux of the Coalition Avenir Québec, trailed by more than 20,000 votes.

The riding's electors apparently did not heed the advice of onetime Equality Party leader Robert Libman, also a former Côte St. Luc mayor and B'nai Brith regional director, that anglophones should consider the CAQ to show their dissatisfaction with the Liberals' policies affecting anglophones.

One Great Return Deserves Another

Over 95 percent of Foremost Financial clients investing in our Mortgage Investment Trusts are return clients... and some have been with us for more than 20 years.

Why? Because of an even more important return: the return on their investments. An average annual return of 8% since 2000 to be precise, outperforming the TSX 10 Year Canada Bonds, Prime Corporate Paper and the Canadian Consumer Price Index in the process.

Much of our success has to do with our diligent approach into establishing a diversified portfolio of first mortgage investments within the CTA. But at the end of the day, it's all about dependable returns.

Cdn. Peres Center spreads message of peace

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

It's not only governments that can strive for peace among nations. Citizens can, and should, too.

That's the message the Canadian Peres Center for Peace is spreading to Diaspora Jews and non-Jews alike in its second full year of operation.

The center raises money to support ongoing, peace-building humanitarian activities in Israel.

Arie Raif, the Toronto-based CEO and founder of the Canadian arm of the Israeli non-profit, said that after almost two years of hard work by its board, directors and volunteers, the center has made "major inroads" with Canada's Jewish community.

The organization's board of governors and directors and committee members comprise a veritable who's who of known community leaders from across the country.

They include former Canadian Jewish Congress president Mark Freiman, former Congress legal counsel Benjamin Shinewald, former Congress CEO Bernie Farber, Ted Sokolsky, president and CEO of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, and Leo Adler, former director of national affairs for Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies, among others.

"We're a brand that represents everything positive that Israel has to offer," Raif said in a recent interview.

The Peres Center for Peace is in the midst of its new fundraising campaign, called "Reason for Hope."

He said Jewish communities in the Diaspora – including Canada – are starting to understand that they have the power to change the narrative on Israel and promote all the good the Jewish state does.

Israeli President Shimon Peres, founder of the NGO, candidly admits that while he may not know what's best for Israel, he does know what the country needs: a change of perception in the rest of the world, Raif said.

To that end, the Canadian Peres Center for Peace envisions both Jewish and non-Jewish Canadians becoming active in spreading peaceful messages about coexistence in the Middle East.

"The fate of our future coexistence is not only in Israelis' hands, but also in the hands of the Diaspora" community, he said.

Raif said his center presents the "nice face" of Israel and strives to show how Israelis do care about the Palestinians, despite what might be said in the media about Israel.

The center directs most of its resources towards humanitarian activities on the ground in Israel, he said, with a priority on saving children's lives and facilitating interaction between Israeli and Palestinian youth.

With increased donations from Canadians during this second year of operation – donations have "gone into the millions," Raif said – the center has increased funding for Canadian medications to ship to children in need in Israel.

Raif noted that the Peres Center in Israel has so far helped save more than 8,000 Palestinian children's lives over the course of its existence.

Its Canadian arm is developing training programs for Palestinian and Israeli medical residents. It envisions them partnering with various Canadian hospitals and being sponsored by the non-profit to come here to learn.

Raif said the Peres Center plans to announce the training sites in 2013.

Arie Raif

He said he hopes other Jewish community organizations become more supportive of the Peres Center.

"We must admit that up to now, the center has had very little [material] support from Canadian Jewish organizations and the Canadian government," he said.

Still, some recognition is coming its way, and Raif said the community can expect to see a media campaign next year highlighting its achievements.

"My dream is that we will fulfil our humanitarian mandate and hope other organizations will join us in bringing reconciliation to the troubled neighbourhood called the Middle East," Raif said.

Raif hinted the center is currently trying to "co-ordinate our efforts with a major Jewish advocacy group," although he declined to name it.

He said the Canadian Peres Center for Peace will soon approach the federal government for funding as well. In the end, Raif believes peace will only come through person-to-person interaction.

"There are fanatics on both sides [of the Israeli-Palestinian] conflict," he said.

"Moshe Dayan was right when he said, 'If you want to make peace you don't talk to your friends, you talk to your enemies.'"

'Morals come before pragmatism'

Sobhaninia did not say which countries he expects will follow Canada's example.

Neither Iran nor Canada has had a full ambassador in the other's capital since 2007, after a breakdown in relations in the wake of Iranian-Canadian photographer Zahra Kazemi being tortured and killed in Iran in 2003. Both countries' embassies were being headed by lower-level diplomatic officials.

The United States hasn't had an embassy in Tehran since the hostage crisis of 1979, and Britain's embassy in Tehran has remained closed since it was stormed by protesters last November.

Baird said Canadians in Iran seeking "routine consular or passport services" were told to contact the Canadian embassy in Turkey or any other Canadian mission outside Iran.

Additionally, Ottawa has advised travellers to avoid Iran and reminded Iranian-Canadians that the Iranian regime doesn't recognize dual citizenship.

"By doing so, Iran makes it virtually impossible for government of Canada officials to provide consular assistance to Iranian-Canadians in difficulty," Baird said.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu immediately praised the Canadian government's decision, saying Ottawa had "adopted a bold and leader-like step that sends a clear message to Iran and the rest of the world."

"This practical step should serve as an example of morality and international responsibility to the international community. It is important for the international community to join this pressure by setting clear red lines for Iran," Netanyahu said.

The sentiment was echoed by Israeli President Shimon Peres, who thanked Canada in a Sept. 8 statement for proving that "morals come before pragmatism" and for demonstrating that "policy must reflect principles and values."

Israel's ambassador to Canada, Miriam Ziv, also thanked Baird and Prime Minister Stephen Harper for Canada's "courageous and principled stand," she said in a statement.

NDP foreign affairs critic Paul Dewar said his party doesn't think the move was prudent.

"We are concerned that cutting off diplomatic relations at this time is a symbolic gesture, but unfortunately doesn't achieve any real result in terms of influencing or halting activities of the regime in Iran, activities which deeply concern us all," he wrote in an email to The C/N.

"The safety of Canadian personnel on the ground in Iran is of the utmost concern. We also must protect our ability to provide consular assistance to Canadian nationals in Iran, including Canadians on death row, and ensure Canada maintains its presence and influence on the world stage."

Canadian Jewish community organizations all praised the government's move.

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) called it an "appropriate" response to Iran.

"We believe that these developments create a window of opportunity for Canada to move towards listing the Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps (IRGC) as a terrorist entity, consistent with Canada's designation of Iran as a state sponsor of terrorism. Such a statement would further isolate Iran and together with the strictest enforcement of a comprehensive sanctions program may be our last chance to avoid the need for military confrontation," Shimon Fogel, CIJA's CEO said.

Frank Dimant, CEO of B'nai Brith Canada, said "all Canadians of good conscience" should welcome the news.

Avi Benlolo, president and CEO of Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center Canada also commended the government, saying all Canadians "should be proud that Canada has taken this ethical stand."

Expatriate Iranians in Canada hailed Ottawa's decision to cut political ties with the Iranian regime.

Iranian ex-pat Reza Akhlaghi, a senior writer and editor specializing in the Middle East with the New York-based Foreign Policy Association, told The C/N that most Iranian-Canadians welcomed the news.

"The vast majority of the Iranian community is overjoyed with the news of the embassy closure, since they have suffered so much from the Iranian government and its policies more than anybody. You can witness the happiness of Iranians all over Facebook," he said.

There are some 120,000 Canadians of Iranian descent in Canada.

Baird urges a return to the negotiating table

Referring to his Israeli counterpart, Avigdor Lieberman, Baird said he "gets along very well" with him. "He's a strong and principled guy."

Voicing admiration for Israeli President Shimon Peres, Baird called him "a remarkable guy."

Baird disclosed he also has a "great relationship" with the foreign ministers of Jordan and Saudi Arabia and a "pretty good relationship" with Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Salam Fayyad.

Canada is a major financial supporter of the PA, he said, reminding his audience that Ottawa has pledged $300 million over five years to assist the Palestinians.

Baird said Canada has continually objected to anti-Israel material in PA school texts. "We've raised the issue of incitement with the PA. It's really bad. We'll continue to push this issue."

Expressing hope that "the Palestinians and Israel can live in peace and prosperity," Baird urged both sides to return to the negotiating table and resolve their differences.

Baird said he remains very concerned over the new Egyptian government's attitude toward Egypt's 1979 peace treaty with Israel.

In comments on the current civil war in Syria, he said Canada is not contemplating military intervention there at this stage in developments.

But he admitted that global diplomatic efforts to end the bloodshed in Syria have fizzled. "We hope the violence can be stopped at the earliest opportunity."

Canada is appalled by the methods the Syrian government has used in responding to the uprising. "We're horrified by the war [President Bashar] Assad is waging against his own people," he said.

Baird said Canada is expanding its regimen of economic sanctions against Syria and doing its best to support United Nations food programs assisting Syrian refugees who have fled the country.

Voicing concern over Syria's stockpile of chemical weapons, Baird cautioned that they might fall into "the wrong hands."

In his only comment on Hezbollah, Baird said its military buildup in southern Lebanon "casts a shadow" over the Middle East.

French-banned author to be republished in Quebec

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A small Quebec publisher's imminent publication of the collected pamphlets of French writer Louis-Ferdinand Céline, whose virulently antisemitic works are banned in France, is causing a stir in that country.

Les Editions Huit, based in Quebec City, plans to release Louis-Ferdinand Céline, Ecrits polémiques this month. The 1,040-page compilation includes some 300 pages of criticism by Régis Tettamanzi, a professor at the Université de Nantes in France, who wrote his doctoral thesis on Céline's pamphlets.

Céline (1894-1961) is considered one of the most influential literary writers of his time, but his racism also makes him one of the most controversial.

Best known in the English-speaking world for his first novel Journey to the End of the Night, Céline was convicted in absentia after World War II of being a Nazi collaborator and lived in exile for several years.

Last year, the French government refused to include Céline among the 500 Icons of French Culture because of his antisemitic writings.

Among the pamphlets to be republished by Les Editions Huit are the banned Bagatelle pour un massacre (1937), L'École des cadavres (1938), and Les beaux draps (1941), all of which espouse blatant hatred of Jews, as well as Nazi sympathies, and have not been republished since the end of the war.

Even Céline's 100-year-old widow, Lucette Destouches, has fought a legal battle to prevent the author's pamphlets from being reprinted in France, the French newsmagazine L'Express reported, saying that is what her husband would have wanted.

The family lawyer and Céline biographer François Gibault explained that these pamphlets were written at a time when "the majority of the French and many writers were antisemites, (and so) it was very common to be and to express these type of opinions..."

"When he wrote them, Céline did not know of the existence of the concentration camps. He would only know after the war, like the majority of Frenchmen."

Louis-Ferdinand Céline

Céline, however, never retracted nor apologized.

Les Editions Huit publisher Rémi Ferland explained that the goal of re-releasing these works is to "demythify" them, in an interview with Le Devoir.

"[T]he more these texts are hidden, the more they become attractive. For sure these texts are hateful, but dated and stale," said Ferland, who teaches French-language literature at Université Laval.

Only about 400 copies are to be printed, he said.

Under Canadian law, a work comes into the public domain 50 years after the author's death. Ferland said the book will not be distributed in France nor sold directly to French citizens.

Les Editions Huit, founded in 1990, publishes only a couple of titles a year and specializes in reprinting books from the past, usually the 19th-century that are rare or difficult to access.

There is a Quebec connection to Céline. Jean-François Nadeau recalled in his 2010 book Adrien Arcand, führer canadien that the author met with the fascist leader in Montreal in 1938 and attended one of the party's meetings.

Teens get to experience Israel on NCSY trip

Vicky Tobianah
Special to the CJN

A summer in Israel impacted Baylee Rubinoff's life.

When Rubinoff, 17, a Grade 12 student at Northern Secondary School went on National Conference of Synagogue Youth's (NCSY) The Jerusalem Journey TII this summer, her experience was incredible, she said.

"I got to know the country over the very short month," she said.

TII is a four-week intensive trip that takes about 120 mostly public high school students from across Canada, but mostly from Toronto, to explore Israel. The goal is to allow students to explore their heritage while travelling throughout the entire country - from the Golan Heights to the beaches of Eilat.

Rabbi Leib Irons, director of education at NCSY, who oversees their summer programs, said, "TII combines many elements that parents are trying to infuse in their children: a love for Israel, a love of Judaism, and a healthy, safe environment with positive role models."

The students visited Rosh Hanikra, the Israeli-Lebanon border, and Safed, and went rafting in the Kinneret, kayaked down the Jordan River, toured the De Karina chocolate factory, and visited the Ein Gedi desert oasis.

He said their goal is to provide students who have little Jewish background with the chance to discover who they are and find their place in Judaism.

"It's the one time in their lives that they're able to give themselves a real shot to experience what it means to be a Jew in the land of Israel," said Rabbi Irons.

"It's a true Jewish experience, and we try to make things as authentic as possible."

Just four years ago, the trip had only 11 participants from Toronto. This year there are 88. He said one of the reasons for their success is that they offer students a chance to continue the experience once they return to Canada.

"When someone gets involved, they're not just getting involved in a summer program. For me it's a launching pad for a larger Jewish experience," said Rabbi Irons.

"The goal is to be part of the community when they get back, to come to reunions and to stay in touch."

And after a summer in Israel, many students do just that. Since returning from various NCSY summer trips, students have taken on leadership roles within NCSY. One is on the executive committee, another started a Jewish business leadership program, and others have started Jewish Student Union clubs at their public high schools.

For Rubinoff, one of the most memorable parts of the trip was dancing at the Kotel. "To be surrounded by friends, singing at the top of their lungs, with strangers all around joining in is so amazing," she said.

Nobody feels like a stranger. The Kotel brings people from all over the world together as one big happy family."

The next information session for NCSY's Summer 2013 trips will take place on Sept. 23 in Thornhill. Visit www.ncsysummer.com for more information.

Philanthropist spearheaded Pier 21

HALIFAX — Halifax philanthropist, volunteer, fundraiser and all-round go-getter Ruth Goldbloom was remembered as a woman who refused to say no, refused to give up and went the extra mile to see a project completed.

Goldbloom died August 29 at age 88 after a short battle with cancer. It was the only battle she ever lost.

At a funeral service attended by dignitaries and everyday folk, more than 1,500 people heard her three children eulogize a mother they loved and from whom they learned many life lessons, and a community worker who diligently and unselfishly made life better for thousands of people.

A member of the Order of Canada and the Order of Nova Scotia, Goldbloom's greatest legacy was the development of a dingy warehouse on the Halifax waterfront into a Canadian museum, Pier 21, through which one million new Canadians arrived between 1923 and 1971.

Starting in 1990, when she began a campaign to refurbish the site, Goldbloom raised $4.5 million by banging on boardroom doors across Canada until the people in charge donated money. Her Rolodex included company and university presidents, the highest-ranking politicians of every stripe, and people from all walks of life.

Goldbloom listed among her friends, artists, teachers, nurses, doctors, humanitarian aid workers, social activists, tailors, grocers, clergy, war veterans and new Canadians.

"She reminded us as citizens that we are all responsible for one another," said Rabbi Ari Isenberg, spiritual leader of Shaar Shalom Synagogue in Halifax, where Ruth and her husband, Richard, former head of pediatrics at Halifax's IWK Health Centre (Children's Hospital), were members for more than 40 years.

"We were all viewed through the same lens, despite, and maybe because of, our differences."

When reflecting on his own father's arrival through Pier 21 decades before, Rabbi Isenberg said, Pier 21 was the "House that Ruth built. It was Ruth's fourth child, eighth grandchild and second husband."

Ruth's son, Alan Goldbloom, said his mother, who remained youthful and enthusiastic about life until her passing, always said, "My goal is to die young, as late as possible."

He talked about his parent's marriage of 66 years. "My parents set an example for me. When I became a father, I hoped I would be as good a parent as they were."

Daughter Barbara reflected how, in their home, the only voices ever raised were in laughter.

"They never yelled at us or at one another," she said. "We had a life of superlatives. Everything was always the best, the greatest. Things were always 'perfect,' according to my mother. I thought I was her only daughter, but, in the past few months, as she was nearing her end, people called and I heard so many say she was like a mother to them."

David Goldbloom drew a laugh when he recalled how his mother, always outspoken and with an opinion, and a major Liberal party supporter, wondered, "How can Canadian Jews vote Conservative?"

Stephen Goldbloom, one of seven grandchildren, spoke on behalf of all of them. "We felt we won the grandparent lottery when, as we'd walk down the street with her, she was always stopped and praised by strangers. She was always the eternal optimist."

Idbloom Born Ruth Miriam Schwartz in 1923 in New Waterford, N.S., to immigrant parents from Russia. Goldbloom met future husband Richard when she studied at McGill University. They moved to Halifax from Montreal in 1967. She became involved in Jewish and community causes receiving seven honorary doctorates and countless awards from Jewish and community organizations. She was the first female chair of Halifax United Way, and was the first Jewish chair of the board of Mount St. Vincent University, a Catholic women's university at the time.

Before he recited the Jewish memorial prayer, Rabbi Ikenberg told the audience, "When I saw Ruth for the last time a couple of weeks ago, I asked, 'What would you like me to pray for, for you?'"

"Ruth told me, 'I have everything I could want and am so grateful for it. Pray for the success of my projects, equity in the world and fulfilment for my family.'"

Offshore gas reserves are a game-changer

Amid the doom-and-gloom reporting that so often concerns Israel and the region – the rise of Islamism hostile to the Jewish state, the threat of a nuclear Iran, etc. – there appeared late last month a 3,000-word article in Britain's Financial Times Magazine that casts a completely different light on Israel's prospects.

According to Reports

PAUL MICHAELS

Under the heading "Field of dreams," FT's Jerusalem bureau chief, Tobias Buck, wrote about how Israel's relatively recent discoveries of huge gas reserves in the Mediterranean Sea stand to transform the country from a resource-deficient to a resource-abundant powerhouse, amounting to an "economic revolution."

The Tamar field, discovered in 2009, is estimated to have reserves of about 10 trillion cubic feet of natural gas, while the nearby Leviathan field, found the following year, is substantially larger still – "the largest deep-water gas reservoir found anywhere in the world over the past decade," Buck notes.

"The two fields, together with a string of smaller discoveries," he writes, "will cover Israel's domestic demand for gas for at least the next 25 years and still leave hundreds of billions of cubic feet for sale abroad. The government take from the gas fields alone is forecast to reach at least $140 billion over the next three decades – a staggering sum for a relatively small economy such as Israel's."

These discoveries didn't just come about overnight. The process was a long one fraught with all sorts of risk and uncertainty. But it took daring visionary Israelis such as lawyer-turned-entrepreneur Gideon Tadmor, "widely regarded as the pioneer of Israel's natural gas industry," to transform a vision into a reality.

As Buck explains, Tadmor was convinced that since gas fields had been found in Egypt, similar fields should exist elsewhere in the region. Tadmor "felt that the geological trend would not stop at the political border – and should extend into Israeli waters," Buck writes.

Tadmor was correct, but the process was arduous, starting with onshore drilling in 1991 (which was unsuccessful) and then moving over many years, and with mounting financial pressures, farther and farther offshore from the Israeli coast.

What made the process even more difficult was the inability of Tadmor's company, Avner Oil & Gas, to get funding from large European and American energy firms. Tadmor says they didn't want to risk their ventures in Arab countries by investing in Israel.

He finally found an investor in Samedan Oil, an Oklahoma-based exploration company that was too small to have to worry about alienating Arab interests. The investment paid off, big time. Samedan went on to become Noble Energy "and emerge alongside Avner and Delek, an Israeli conglomerate, as one of the three leading players in the Israeli natural gas boom."

This boom (whose proceeds are yet to be realized) does not come without its own risks, since other countries in the region, such as Lebanon and Turkey, are challenging Israel's finds with territorial claims of their own.

Turkey, which occupies northern Cyprus, is contesting Cyprus' dealing with Israel in the Mediterranean, and in the case of Lebanon, there's the additional threat of terrorism from Hezbollah.

Israel believes it can deal with these threats and argues that all surrounding parties (including the Palestinians in Gaza) stand to benefit from the economic windfall. Given the profound economic malaise gripping the Middle East, this would only make sense. If only.

There's also an important Canadian component to Israel's ventures.

As reported in the Financial Post in late June, Canada and Israel signed an energy agreement that will allow for more cooperation and collaboration on energy issues. For example, Israel stands to benefit from Canadian expertise in developing yet another major find in Israel: the Shfela Basin southwest of Jerusalem, containing about 250 billion barrels of shale oil, the third-largest such reserves in the world.

This is but a glimpse of what can be an exciting, prosperous future – and not only for Israel.

Skateboarding for peace in the Middle East

Michael Brooke
Special to The CJN

What would happen if you took longboards and helmets and brought them to kids in Israel and later to the Palestinian Territories?

Arthur Rashkovan who is one of Israel's top surfers and runs Surfing 4 Peace, said the premise made total sense to him.

Working with my friend, Abraham Paskowitz, sales manager of Carver Skateboards in California, I was led to Rashkovan.

And so the Search/Spark/Stoke tour was born.

Longboards are larger versions of traditional skateboards. They turn easily and have very soft wheels, making them easier to learn on than regular street skateboards.

Paskowitz and I began planning for the trip in February, with Matt Olsen, director of Explore Corps, a peace-building organization. I knew that longboards could be a vehicle for fun but I also had a gut feeling they could be tools of peace. I just didn't realize how deeply emotional this whole experience would be.

Surfing 4 Peace worked with the Peres Center for Peace to put on the event. All of the longboards and helmets were donated and will be left with the centre for future events.

Yoni Ettinger, a pro longboarder for Earthwing Skate-

Michael Brooke skateboarding in Jaffa boards, explained the basics of skateboarding at the first demonstration, which took place at the centre. The kids followed his direction – most of the time! Once they felt somewhat balanced, they started rolling faster.

"I have been teaching skateboarding for many years, but most times, I have taught people who have at least some experience," Ettinger said. "Watching these pure beginners learn quickly was wonderful."

Mickey Kook of Surfing 4 Peace said he found the experience truly transformative. "It is so easy to get caught up in what the media choose to show us," he said, and reality always has a way of surprising us, and changing and opening our minds.

After two exciting hours, I knew already that we had achieved something magical. The question was what would things be like in east Jerusalem and Jericho? But first, the team was off to Sderot.

Before the demo got underway, care was taken to locate the closest bomb shelter. Sderot had been bombed just a week before the team arrived. "Sderot was an absolutely incredible experience and truly emotional for everyone," said Tami Hay-Sagiv, director of sport for the Peres Center.

There was one young child from a fairly impoverished family who, as the demo finished up, would not let go of the board that Hay-Sagiv was holding. I will never forget the look in his eyes.

The following day began early for surfers and skaters. The team's chartered bus headed to east Jerusalem and then to Jericho. "I was nervous about going to Palestinian territories," explained Ettinger. "But what I quickly discovered was that we had a bond and that bond was longboarding."

The boys took to the longboards as one would expect, but it was truly exceptional to watch young Palestinian girls and women hop on as well.

For Ettinger, the east Jerusalem demo was the highlight of the trip. "I held the hands of a Palestinian woman who needed me for balance. I could feel how happy she was and that in turn, made me very happy," he said.

Next stop was Jericho, which is under the control of the Palestinian Authority. The 25 kids took to longboarding quickly. They were fresh off a soccer practice and some removed their soccer cleats to get a better footing on the board. Over the course of an hour, a bond developed between Arabs, Israelis, and North Americans.

When I first told people in Canada that I was planning to go to the Palestinian Territories, they honestly thought I was insane. There was serious concern for my well-being. But I can assure everyone that with help from Surfing 4 Peace/Explore Corps and the support of the Peres Center for Peace, our trip was safe and accomplished something truly significant. We got people to think differently about themselves and the world around them. I see this as an important first step in opening minds and creating a climate for change and eventually peace.

Second baseman signs contract with Padres

Maxx Tissenbaum

David Grossman
Special to The CJN

For years, Sheldon Taerk took his grandson to the ballpark to watch the Toronto Blue Jays practise, play and, if things went well, maybe get a few autographs.

It may have been more of a treat for Taerk than the youngster, who like most his age, had dreams of playing on the field with the big boys.

Things have changed since those regular trips to the SkyDome. That grandson, Maxx Tissenbaum, is all grown up and is now a professional player in the San Diego Padres' organization.

A 22-year-old second baseman from North York, Tissenbaum signed a pro contract with the Padres not long after the team selected him in the 11th round (345th overall) of this year's Major League draft.

"I will always cherish those days of going to the ballpark with my grandfather — something really special," said Tissenbaum. "And we can still do it, but there could very well be more cheering for San Diego."

The Blue Jays initially drafted Tissenbaum, but that was several years back when he was picked in the 43rd round—so far down the ladder that Toronto scout Kevin Briand suggested the youngster would be wise to pursue a university education. Tissenbaum did just that at Stony Brook University in Long Island, N.Y., where he was scouted by many teams, including the Padres.

Maybe the Padres were attracted by Tissenbaum's three exceptional years at Stony Brook, or their scouting staff clued in to Tissenbaum's performance with Canada's national junior team.

Playing for one of the best college teams in the United States, Tissenbaum showed he has power and a high baseball IQ. He was Stony Brook's cleanup hitter and had some impressive stats: he hit .390 with 12 home runs.

But Stony Brook, a team that went 52-15 this past season and made it to the NCAA Division 1's College World Series in Omaha, Neb., really benefited from his defensive skills. To no one's surprise, Tissenbaum's fielding was also something the Padres noticed about the three-time All-American, who boasted a slick .970 fielding average.

"It all sounds glamorous, along with the pretty stuff on TV," said Tissenbaum. "But baseball is a game of failure. If you haven't gone 0-30 at the plate, you haven't played enough. There are hours and hours of practising, learning from coaches and even when things go sour for awhile, it's comforting to think about what got me to where I am now."

Israelis play in beach volleyball championships

Joel Jacobson
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Two Israeli teams came to Halifax for the World Under-21 Beach Volleyball Championships with low expectations.

Yes, they wanted to win what they could, but with a low-level world ranking and moderate performance (15th out of 30 teams) at the European championships, coach Shaked Haimy was content to see his young charges gain world experience.

Yet, in their three-team pool, with all players advancing to the elimination round, Israeli women Yael Lotan and Viktoria Nesterov downed Guatemala 21-18, 21-14 in their opener before falling to Canada's Taylor Pischke and Melissa Humana-Paredes, who would advance to the quarter-finals, 21-9, 21-7. Israel was eliminated when the team dropped their third match, 21-19, 14-21, 15-12 to Venezuela.

The men, Alon Sanderovich and Netanel Ohana, lost all three matches in their pool, failing to advance to the elimination round. They fell to Austria 21-19, 21-15 and Latvia 21-7, 21-11 on opening day, then to Canada's Grant O'Gorman and Aaron Nusbaum 21-19, 21-8 on day two.

"We lack competitive experience," Haimy admitted the day before the tournament started. "Beach volleyball is not that big in Israel. The level is not that high as we only have three months of competition at home. And we don't have the funding or sponsorship culture to finance teams travelling around the world."

Sanderovich said the players will enjoy meeting top competition. "We hope to get out of our pool, but the main thing is to have fun. [Ohana] and I were put together [as a team] by Shaked, and we have good chemistry after one tournament playing as a team."

He said his first sport was judo, followed by basketball, which he played for seven years in the Maccabi Tel Aviv program. "I knew I wasn't good enough, so I joined a school volleyball team and, after two years of indoor, found beach and fell in love with it."

Prior to their opener, Nesterov said she's honoured to represent Israel as she sees beach volleyball providing the greatest chance "to make progress and eventually advance to the Olympics."

Haimy agreed. "We have the knowledge and talent to get to Rio (for the 2016 Olympics). But it has to happen now. The level of beach volleyball is getting higher. More countries are improving their level and competition is tougher.

"For us, money is the problem. We need funding wherever we can get it," he said.

He cited the costs of training, travel and facilities, as well as the difficulty of enough teams to train with each other. "If we can get that, we'll make something special for Israel. People in Israel want a major [international] success."

Nesterov said people expect things to happen in reverse. "They want results before they give us money to train. I can't understand why it's the reverse."

Between their army service and their regular daily work, the four players still practise and play volleyball for a few hours a day, too. Nesterov and Lotan practised together for about four months before entering the world juniors. "This is for us to work on our game, to get experience and to learn from the other teams," Haimy said.

He explained that the Israeli players at the Halifax championships were funded by a "generous anonymous benefactor," and they are grateful the money looks after a few nights in a hotel, plus food. But once the players are eliminated, they're on their own.

With a laugh, he added, "Not to put pressure on them. I told them, if they lose, they have to look for a place to sleep."

The team was supported with two nights of pre-tourney accommodation by members of the Halifax Jewish community, through the Atlantic Jewish Council. But Haimy said the teams must play without thinking of the monetary consequences.

"We were criticized at home for coming here, that we're not the best in the world, so why spend money [to go to the world championships]. But it's a great experience and it's an honour to have the Israeli flag here," he said. "Our players have worked hard and they deserve to have this opportunity."

Young Jews show growing attachment to roots

Wayne Firestone and Mark J. Penn
ITJ

The older generation often sees the younger generation as losing its traditional values, wondering, "Why can't they be just like us?"

But in a time of expanding globalism, open social networking and greater geographical disbursement, a surprising finding of a recent poll we conducted shows that Jewish consciousness among millennials – young adults in university – is rising, not falling.

In 2006, Hillel sponsored a study that surveyed more than 600 American Jewish students. It revealed that Jewish youths were more likely than their parents' generation to be part of an interfaith family, to have a non-Jewish boyfriend or girlfriend and to identify as ethnically Jewish rather than religiously Jewish.

A similar study soliciting the opinions of 641 Canadian Jewish students was conducted in the months that followed. Compared to the Americans who were surveyed, more of the Canadian students polled identified as religious and involved in the Jewish community, but the concerns about the future of the Jewish community were the same.

Poll results differ in Canada, the U.S.

The study prompted Hillel organizations in Canada and the U.S. to make changes to engage more students in Jewish campus life.

The results of a followup survey of 600 American Jewish undergraduates and graduate students conducted by Penn Schoen & Berland (PSB) released last month, reveals some surprising truths.

Nearly half of all Jewish university students today participate in Hillel events – a 36 per cent increase from the last time PSB did this poll in 2005.

More than half of the students said they would participate in a Hillel event in the next month – up from only 36 per cent seven years ago. And nearly 75 per cent of students said they viewed Hillel and "Hillel people" favourably, an increase of more than 20 per cent since 2005.

Hillel of Greater Toronto executive director Zac Kaye said the Canadian study has not been updated.

The next most important Jewish institution on campus was Chabad, which is also growing in popularity with university students.

The rise in Jewish activism also is tied to strong support for Israel. Seventy-eight per cent of Jewish students today say that support for Israel is important to them – virtually the same percentage that says social justice and having a sense of responsibility for the Jewish people is important.

The success of Hillel is based on a six-year effort that started with the sophisticated deployment of early social networking techniques.

The idea was simple: to use snowballing student connections as the path to bring in more students. Hillel not only seized on this insight, but also took it backward from virtual to real – training and employing nearly 1,000 Jewish students to engage about 35,000 uninvolved Jewish peers on more than 70 campuses across the globe.

In every case, the goal was to help the unengaged students meet, explore and connect to Jewish life on their own terms. It turns out that peers not only can reach students in ways that institutions can't, but they also can do it creatively, imaginatively and with lasting effect.

Secondly, Hillel hypothesized that in addition to going broader, it also could go deeper. On 10 pilot campuses, it placed Jewish educators and rabbis trained to engage students in study and conversation, encouraging students to ask the big questions that make university such a potent place for development and growth.

As students progress in their education, they are more likely to participate in Jewish events on campuses, and such participation reaches its zenith among graduate students. This increase in interest is across Reform, Conservative and Orthodox students, as well as those self-defined as "just Jewish."

Hillel playing greater role in students' lives

The greater success of Jewish-based organizations on campus is no doubt the result of innovative work by those organizations, but it also signals some real changes going on underneath.

Universalism may have reached its limits, with the reassertion of a greater sense of ethnic and religious identity growing in its place. Social networking makes it easier for groups to come together and find their commonality; threats to Israel and the potential growth of nuclear weapons in the region give an urgency to that connection. Birthright Israel is also giving many an up-close and personal experience.

So just when we all thought young people were most likely to blend in even further and abandon purely Jewish institutions, instead we are seeing them reassert their Jewish identity, their support for Israel and, perhaps most important, seek out connections with one another to feel part of a larger community they can call their own.

Teachers' Center maximizes learning experiences

Reva Kaiser

Special to The CIN

The cherry-red wall that jettisons out behind reception is an unexpected but cheerful welcome to Toronto Teachers' Center. Simple yet striking, it's a design element that concurrently conveys creativity, original thinking, professionalism and affability – a fitting descriptive metaphor of the qualities of the centre itself, its mission and the dedicated people behind it.

Welcome to Toronto's candyland for teachers, where the goal is to provide tools and training to teachers and school administrators to promote the highest quality of Jewish education. "Ultimately," stresses Chaya Messinger, director of the centre, "the purpose is to benefit the end users of the educational system: the students."

Centrally located in Lawrence Plaza, the centre serves teachers of all grade levels, from preschool through Grade 12. While it is geared toward teachers from Orthodox Jewish day schools, it has been visited by staff from the wide range of Jewish schools in the city, and even by Jewish teachers employed by the Toronto District School Board.

"The resources [at the centre] give teachers the opportunity to think in ways they never did before," says Tamara Grunberger, middle school supervisor of Netivot HaTorah Day School, and an avid user of the centre. "They allow teachers to be more creative, which enhances their ability to connect with students."

Under the auspices of Torah Umesorah, the centre, modelled after two existing Torah Umesorah teachers' centres in the United States, opened in January 2011. Funded partially by Torah Umesorah and primarily by private donors, the centre has no membership, lecture or usage fees. The centre does, however, charge

United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism REGIONAL YOUTH DIRECTOR

Director of Youth Activities for Eastern Canada Region

This position is a key staff role with United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism's Eastern Canada region, supervising and supporting the day-to-day operations of USCJ's youth programs United Synagogue Youth (USY) and Kadima. The Regional Youth Director (RYD) will report to a supervisor from the USCJ international office and will consult with the region's Youth Commission Chair. As head of the Youth Department for the Region, the RYD is responsible for effective and efficient administration of regional youth programs. This position may be structured as either full- or part-time, depending on fit with the right candidate. The duties include growing and retaining USY/Kadima membership and chapters in the region; working with USCJ-member congregations ("kehillot") to strengthen their youth programs; developing, organizing and delivering programs, services and training by providing guidance in training youth leaders in Jewish values and leadership techniques. Education and Work Experience: College or university degree, demonstrated knowledge of Judaism. Knowledge and Skills: Must be an observant Conservative Jew, be a regular attendee of a Conservative Movement kehilla and demonstrate a commitment to Conservative Jewish living, must have a driver's license, must be able to travel on a regular basis to visit affiliated congregations in region. This includes evening and weekend responsibilities as determined and agreed upon by lay and professional supervisors. If you are interested in this opportunity, please submit a resume along with a cover letter to:

at-cost prices for materials, such as printing or craft supplies, and a nominal fee for computer classes to encourage registrants to attend.

The centre is organized into three primary spaces: computer lab, boardroom/library and craft centre.

Computer classes and tutorials are offered to teachers and school administrators in the computer lab. The eight computers flanking the wall have been uploaded with a comprehensive menu of English and Hebrew software to assist users in accessing or modifying existing teaching tools online, or in creating new materials.

The room also houses an industrial-size poster printer, available for printing the large, visually appealing teachers' aids frequently displayed on classroom walls and school halls. And, at the nearby copy centre, visitors can print and copy materials in various sizes and colours at-cost.

Artfully decorated with artistic posters and informational bulletin boards, even the halls of the light-filled centre are attractive and welcoming. The centre's es-thetically appealing space shows teachers first-hand how striking visuals can make a significant impression. Plus, everything on display was created here.

"Because of what the centre offers, it's easier for teachers to make things look better... and thus better impact their students," says Grunberger.

Lectures are popular at the centre, focusing on pertinent topics. "Teachers are asking for more lectures on how to improve their students' – and their own – classroom performances," says Messinger. Past events have included presentations on such topics as effective report card techniques, maximizing PTA conferences, understanding sensory processing and helping students improve their organizational skills.

The corporate-style boardroom – equipped with the newest technology, including a Smart Board and projector – not only hosts these lectures, but is available at no cost to educators and school administrators for their own meetings and gatherings.

Craft room's a real candy store for teachers

But the gem of the Toronto Teachers' Center is unquestionably the Make-It-and-Take-It Center, which has been described as a candy store for teachers. Die-cutting and button-making machines, game-making pieces, rolls of patterned paper, stickers, foam letters and shapes, feathers and stickers are just some of the "sweets" perched on the shelves. For the arts and crafts aficionado, there is the exhilarating sense that anything one might possibly need is simply waiting to be used.

As I enter this craft paradise, a veteran Grade 1 teacher is preparing materials midsummer for the beginning of the school term. Malka Levi, who is teaching her second and third generations of students at Eitz Chaim Day Schools, is creating personalized buttons with the name and picture of each of her incoming Grade 1 students to be worn to school on the first day.

"This is the best place!" Levi declares. A veteran in the field, she is embracing the changes and its accompanying benefits. Levi anticipates creating projects herself after taking an introductory computer course at the centre.

Not that it's necessary, because the staff is so accessible. While the centre is extremely user-friendly and designed so that visitors can work independently, staff is always willing to assist. Unanimously, visitors enthuse about the warm reception, the capable and helpful staff and the welcoming atmosphere.

The Toronto Teacher's Center is ready to help in nearly any capacity, and opens its space for novel uses. One school held its PD day here, thereby avoiding school-related interruptions. An Apple computer representative was brought in to give specific software instruction. Messinger herself works personally with visitors. She recently helped develop a unique Parashah curriculum, has advised first-time teachers on planning their new classrooms, and is always on site to guide and assist.

According to Messinger, the centre is also changing how teachers prepare their lessons because of its networking opportunities. "I've seen teachers working individually who then start discussing what they're doing," she says. Grunberger concurs. "It's a place where teachers can collaborate and improve the quality of education for their students," she says.

Messinger herself is working with colleagues in an extended capacity as she helps Montreal establish a similar centre. She has also been contacted by the Antwerp Jewish community for guidance in setting one up there as well.

Here in Toronto, the centre is always looking to expand with more tools and services to address unmet needs. Messinger hopes that the centre will soon include resources for special education teachers and have an occupational therapist on staff.

The existence of the centre has fostered a sense of appreciation: teachers feel the community recognizes their efforts. In turn, that further motivates them. "It's important that the community is aware of this incredible resource for teachers – and the fact that they are using it," says Messinger. "This fosters partnerships between the teachers and the parents of the students they are educating, who are all in it together, since the end goal is each child's growth and success."

Keeping kosher as we age

LiSe Stern
JNS.org

We all have our traditional kosher favourites – and for many this means Ashkenazi fare such as slow-roasted brisket, matzah ball soup, lockshen kugel, and perhaps cholent and blintzes. Unfortunately, such kosher classics aren't the best choices for us as we get older.

Toby Smithson is a spokesperson for the Academy of Nutrition and Dietetics and founder of DiabetesEveryDay.com. "Age 50 appears to be the time when some of our nutritional needs change," she said. "Our metabolisms begin to slow down, so we need fewer calories – yet at the same time we still need food that is high in nutrients."

The challenge, then, is to get all the nutrients we need

Challenge is to get nutrients without overeating without overeating. If you are physically active, great – though most people are not scaling the same number of mountains at 60 or 70 that they were at 30. There are also specific vitamins and minerals we need more after we hit 50, Smithson says, notably potassium, calcium and vitamins B12 and D. We also need fibre, but slightly less than we do when we're younger.

Sodium is a concern in the opposite direction – too much can contribute to high blood pressure, and we need to significantly reduce consumption as we get older, to about three-quarter teaspoon per day (1,500 milligrams). That includes both what we add to our plate and what occurs in foods naturally. Unless specifically made for seniors, prepared kosher foods can be high in sodium.

Too much sodium may increase blood pressure, and potassium helps blunt sodium's affect, Smithson says. Calcium, coupled with vitamin D, helps with bone strength, and vitamin B12 protects against anemia. Fibre serves multiple purposes. It helps with digestion and heart health, and can help prevent certain kinds of cancer. Good sources include fruits and vegetables, as well as whole grains like oatmeal and brown rice.

For many in their 50s and above, choosing meals and preparing their own food may not be an issue. But as the Jewish population ages, more and more people are living on their own, with family far away. Jewish organizations in several cities around the country offer services to this group. Kosher meals on wheels supplies a daily meal to older adults who cannot easily get out of the house.

In Skokie, Ill., Ted Starcevic is the program manager of home-delivered meals and Kosher to Go for CJE SeniorLife, an organization that serves older adults in a variety of ways. The organization delivers 300 to 400 kosher meals daily. Deliveries are often made by volunteers who visit with their clients when bringing the food, which provides a third of their daily nutritional requirements.

The menus, which are all taste-tested by Starcevic and his staff, are sent to a state dietician for approval. "Sometimes the state dietician will come back and will tell us to switch the apple on Tuesday with the orange on Thursday, for nutritional balance," he said.

Neal Drobnis is co-ordinator of the Kosher Nutrition Program of Jewish Family Service of Rhode Island. The program provides both home delivery and a Senior Café. "The Jewish federation has been really supportive of this program," Drobnis said. It offers kosher lunches daily for a $3 donation and provides transportation. Most guests are in their 80s.

Vitamin D requirements higher after age 50

Café meals are all kosher, as are the delivered meals, and meet federal guidelines in terms of nutrition. "Seniors try to stay away from salt and use salt alternatives," Drobnis said. "Everything is low sodium. In general, they stay away from sugar as well. We try to have a balance of proteins, carbohydrates, fruits and vegetables. For carbs — grains, pasta, bread — we try to use whole grains when we can. It can be very difficult with the budgetary limits to have brown rice or whole wheat pasta."

Zan's Kosher Delicatessen Restaurant runs a similar program in Lake Grove, N.Y., supplying delivered kosher meals for area townships. The Supper Club 60 is offered in the afternoon Mondays through Thursdays, according to Anthony Ruggiero, who owns the business with his brother, Pat. The $4 donation offers a choice from a daily menu. For seniors, Ruggiero says, "We make everything with less salt."

The National Osteoporosis Foundation indicates that our vitamin D needs can almost double once we hit 50 — those under a half century need 400 to 800 IU daily, while those over need 800 to 1,000 IU.

"Vitamin D is needed to help keep bones strong along with calcium," Smithson said. The primary natural source of vitamin D is sunlight, but how our skin absorbs it can depend on where we live, if we use sunblock, and how much time we spend inside, an issue for shut-ins.

If you don't spend much time in the sun, you may need vitamin D supplements; check with a health-care provider for the best balance. Kashrut can be an issue for some vitamin D supplements. Smithson said that there are two kinds, D2 and D3, and "D3 is derived from ultraviolet irradiation of a substance derived from sheep's wool."

In general, the most efficient sources for the nutrients we need as we get older is food, rather than supplements; supplements should do just that — help with what we're getting from food already. Food has the added advantage of being good for multiple nutrients. Dairy products, for example, contain both calcium and potassium.

Other good sources for potassium include beans (think cholent) and fruit, including dried apricots, prunes and raisins (tzimmes, anyone?). Dates are also a good source, along with pistachios and other nuts. (Nuts can be high in fat, so moderation is key.)

Fortunately, it's easy to fit a healthy diet into a kosher diet — for the most part. Brisket isn't the leanest cut of meat, but it can be reserved for special occasions. "Unfortunately, the leanest cuts of beef are not kosher, so we need to have a stronger focus on cutting back on our sources of fats, especially saturated fat," Smithson said.

"Many traditional dishes can be modified," she said. "Dishes like loshken kugel can be made with a heat-resistant sugar substitute and egg whites to make it more heart-healthy and diabetes friendly."

"The best advice is to modify recipes, watch portion size, and add more vegetables to your meals," she added.

Good advice as we head into our 50s, 60s, 70s and 80s. And if we make it to our 90s, that may be the time when we no longer have to worry about moderation, and we can have a second helping of brisket.

Suggested kosher menu for a day

Toby Smithson suggests the following sample kosher menu.

Breakfast: oatmeal, a glass of skim or one per cent milk; one cup of berries, and a slice of whole grain toast with tub margarine, almond butter or peanut butter

Lunch: tuna fish salad with reduced fat mayonnaise; one slice low fat cheese; two slices whole-grain bread, one cup baby bell peppers, one peach or nectarine.

Snack: three graham cracker squares, six ounces low-fat vanilla yogurt sprinkled with cinnamon and chopped almonds.

Dinner: three ounces baked skinless chicken breast, with rosemary; one medium sweet potato; one cup green beans; an orange.

Suggested Shabbat meal

Shabbat: chicken soup with whole-grain noodles; cholent with more beans than meat; a green leafy salad with bite-sized raw vegetables; baked sliced apples with cinnamon and sugar substitute.

New state-of-the-art facility attests to Sutton Group Admiral's record growth

Murray Goldkind
Broker of Record

This is one company that doesn't just talk about growth. It walks the walk, with an ever-increasing number of agents and brokers and an ever-expanding portfolio of services.

Sutton Group Admiral Realty Inc., Brokerage and the Goldkind's are especially proud of their new state-of-the-art 15,000 square foot, first opening soon at Centre St. in Thornhill, will provide additional cutting-edge services and facilities that Agents agents need to further enhance the top-drawer service they give their clients.

This is the Sutton Group Admiral's formula: a major emphasis on opportunity and maximizing value for its agents and brokers.

The record-breaking sales achieved by its ever-growing team — now over 250 agents and brokers — has allowed Sutton Group Admiral to not only consolidate its niche atop the residential resale market, but also to further its presence in the highly competitive field of new home construction sales.

Broker of Record Murray Goldkind prides himself on his ability to read and respond to the needs of home buyers and sellers. Says Murray: "Today's home buyers are looking for one thing: VALUE. The agents and brokers who give them maximum value for their hard-earned dollars will earn their business. Those who don't, won't."

In its dual capacity as re-seller and new home purveyor, Sutton Group Admiral's access to both resale homes and new construction allows it to offer home buyers the best of both worlds, says Sol. "Whether you're looking for a resale home or a new one, you can now explore ALL your interests and options with us."

One thing that hasn't changed, says Sol Goldkind, is Sutton Group Admiral's commitment to work 24 hours a day to earn your trust and ensure your satisfaction."

Marrying under Jewish law without a Canadian divorce: bigamy, polygamy or legal?

Family Matters

by John Syrtash

B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.

Counsel

Garfin Zeidenberg LLP

for 31 years

Section 291(1) of the Canadian Criminal Code stipulates that without a legal divorce recognized by Canadian law, it is illegal for a spouse to remarry. Under section 293(1), anyone who agrees or consents to enter into a conjugal relationship with more than one person at the same time — or celebrates a rite or a ceremony (such as a marriage ceremony) that sanctions such a relationship — is also guilty of a criminal offence.

However, many Jewish spouses have remained under Jewish law or are considering doing so without obtaining a formal Canadian divorce. Many believe that if the marriage ceremony is performed by a Rabbi who is not licensed to perform marriages under Ontario law, then it must be legal. Once married under a "chupah" or wedding canopy they, and some of these clerics, assume that the religious marriage is exempt from Canada's laws of bigamy and polygamy, since the parties' union is only before God and not officiated under the laws of the State.

• The answer? Well, at the very best, this is a grey area in the law and I personally would caution against rolling the dice. Accordingly, I would not advise anyone to enter into any ceremony resembling such a religious remarriage without first obtaining a formal Canadian divorce. Why risk a criminal record, especially if some ex-spouse seeking revenge with nothing to lose decides to approach the police or a Justice of the Peace about laying criminal charges?

The risks are noteworthy. First, the very wording of section 293(1) of the Code describing polygamy as a criminal offence specifically states that one commits a crime merely by "celebrating a rite or a ceremony" that sanctions such a relationship.

• The celebration of such a rite or ceremony is precisely what a couple arguably does if either of them is still legally married under Canadian law and gets married under a "chupah" with a Rabbi. Moreover, the constitutionality of the law against polygamy was recently affirmed by the British Columbia Court of Appeal in Reference re: Criminal Code, s. 293, 2010 BCSC 1588. This Court defended the law against polygamy as constitutional to protect women from multiple marriages where they were found to be vulnerable to abuse, notwithstanding the freedom of religion clause in Canada's Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Similarly, in a number of bigamy cases, the sanctity of marriage as Canadian policy has often been raised by Judges when sentencing bigamists who have intentionally married without obtaining a divorce, irrespective of the circumstances. Therefore as recently as 2011, Justice Gosselin in a Quebec ruling, R. v. Kairous, quoted a 2001 Ontario decision in R. v. Moore (at O.J. No. 4513 at pages 3-5) when it sentenced a man for marrying a woman in Lebanon after leaving his wife behind in Canada without a divorce and commented:

- "Once the decision to marry is taken and both partners participate in a religious or civil marriage ceremony, my view of it is that this creates and formalizes an expectation that the traditional view on the subject will be observed and respected. And if you do marry, it's implicit that you accept that value system. It's a trust.
- When that trust is violated, that's betrayal. And the betrayed parties look to the community that sanctioned their marriage bond for the protection of their expectations. And the community looks to the courts for that sanction. . . ."

A criminal conviction can mean more than a fine or suspended sentence. The offender may no longer be able to cross international borders, so even shopping in Buffalo or enjoying a key lime pie in Miami may become impossible. Future job and career applications could also be endangered. If you are the Rabbi, why be complicit in a possible criminal offence? Why risk it?

The solution: seek competent family law counsel and get your Canadian divorce, whatever may be holding you up.

'Pan pals' share holiday favourites

Norene Gillet
Special to The CJN

Every year, I ask my "pan pals" from near and far to share special memories and recipes that are on their menus for the High Holidays. Some of my pan pals are members of my family. Others are Facebook friends, or fans of my cookbooks whom I've never met in person although we share food memories with a passion. Some are professional cookbook authors, others are home cooks, but we're all connected by a culinary umbilical cord that circles the globe.

My sister Rhonda Matias of Toronto will be making her Mish Mash Chicken Soup, which includes matzah balls, noodles and kreplach. Sweet and sour meatballs, kasha and bowties, lokshen kugel and roast chicken are also on the menu. I plan to bring my super roast brisket, carrot tzimmes and honey chifon cake. Maybe I'll make our late mom's potato knishes. I know they won't compare to the incredible knishes that mom made, but they'll be pretty close. Belle's secret was simple: she always added lots of fried onions and usually some ground-up leftover cooked chicken, and her dough was rolled paper-thin. I can still taste them in my taste memory.

Other holiday favourites that my pan pals have on their menus include challah (usually round), chopped liver, gefilte fish, glazed corned beef, roast turkey, assorted kugels (potato, sweet potato, apple), poppy seed cookies, mandel bread, rogelach, roly polly, fruit fluden and apple cake. Many make recipes from the spattered pages of my cookbooks, others make recipes that have been in their family for generations.

Gluten-free recipes are now finding their place on many holiday tables, and I've started to get requests for gluten-free challah, which I've never been able to make successfully. My pan pals Lisa and Tim Horel of San Francisco have been baking gluten-free for about 10 years. They recently published Gluten-Free Canteen's Book of Nosh: Jewish Holiday Baking and More, recreating Lisa's favourite Jewish baked goods along with Tim's full-colour photos.

To ensure successful results when baking gluten-free, Lisa uses a blend of superfine GF flours from Authentic Foods and always weighs her ingredients: "Using weights will give you a better and more accurate result." She provides detailed information about all sorts of flours, weights, conversions and qualities on her blog, Gluten Free Canteen.

Lisa writes, "It was lucky for me that my mother taught me as much as she did in the short time we had together... I learned some pretty good lessons about Jewish baking. First, everything should be made with love. And second, a little bit is never enough. You just never know who is going to be coming over for dinner, or a nosh."

Lisa's quick challah can be made in a few hours from start to finish. Her book also includes tempting recipes for Braided Challah, Honey Cake, Fig Tart and Apple Upside-Down Cake for the High Holidays — all gluten-free, of course!

Lisa Horel's quick challah in the round

LISA HOREL'S QUICK CHALLAH IN THE ROUND (Gluten Free)

Prep time is about 20 minutes plus rising and baking. Makes about a 2 lb. loaf or round challah.

300 g (about 2 1/3 cups total) GF AP flour (150 g superfine brown rice flour, 75 g each superfine white rice flour and tapioca starch/flour)
50 g (5 tbsp.) tapioca starch/flour
50 g (5 tbsp.) superfine sweet white rice flour
50 g (5 tbsp.) Expandex Modified Tapioca Starch/Flour*
4 heaping tbsp. granulated sugar
2 heaping tsp. instant or bread machine Red Star Yeast
2 1/2 tsp. kosher salt
2 tsp. xanthan gum
1/4 tsp. pectin
1/4 tsp. guar gum
240 g egg (4 whole extra-large eggs)
60 g egg yolks (3 extra-large egg yolks)
2 tbsp. Lyle's Golden Syrup or honey
75 g (heaping 1/3 cup) canola oil
100-130g (1/2 cup plus 3 tbsp.) Pellegrino sparkling water
1 extra-large egg, beaten — for brushing top of dough
1-2 tbsp. white sesame or poppy seeds

Place flours, starches, sugar, yeast, salt, xanthan gum, pectin and guar gum in a stand mixer bowl and whisk. In another small container whisk 4 whole extra-large eggs, 3 extra-large egg yolks, honey or Lyle's syrup and canola oil.

Add 100 grams Pellegrino to dry mixture. Add egg/oil mixture to dry mixture. Using a fork, work the flour mixture into the wet until it is just combined. Place on stand and using dough hook, mix on speed 2 or 3 for about 5-7 minutes or until dough looks shiny and stretchy. If the dough looks very sticky and tough, add up to 30 grams Pellegrino.

Grease a tube pan (or a 9x5-inch loaf pan) with nonstick spray. Wipe out excess. Place dough all around the bottom of the tube or loaf pan using a silicone spatula.

Wet the spatula with water and smooth the dough. Cover loosely with plastic wrap and let the dough rise in a draft free place until double or nearly to the top, about 1-1/2 to 2 hours.

Preheat oven to 350. Place a cast iron skillet or other heatproof pan (not glass) on the bottom rack to heat up with the oven.

Beat remaining egg and brush it gently over the top of the bread. Repeat. Sprinkle top with poppy or sesame seeds. Right before putting the bread in the oven, place a large handful of ice cubes in the hot cast iron skillet or heatproof (not glass) pan in the oven to create steam. Be careful to not burn yourself.

Place bread in the oven and time for 12 minutes. Remove cast iron or heatproof pan carefully. Time the bread for another 20 minutes and remove when the internal temperature is 185 to 190 degrees and the top is pale golden brown. Don't overbake the bread or it will be a little tough. Let cool for a couple of minutes in the pan and then remove bread from pan and cool completely.

Notes: Superfine flours are available at Authentic Foods. They ship to Canada. Superfine flours make all the difference in the taste and texture when baking gluten-free. If you cannot find Expandex, add an additional 50 grams or 5 tablespoons of all-purpose GF flour.

I first connected with Dafi Forer Kremer of Israel several years ago. She had emailed me to ask if I would contribute a recipe for the unique cookbook she was compiling to celebrate Israel's 60th birthday. The Melting Pot: Embarking on Israel's Seventh Decade with Spiritual and Savory Servings reflects the myriad of unique Jewish voices and tastes from Israel and the world over.

There's a recipe to match each week's Torah portion plus an additional chapter for other Jewish and Israeli festivals, along with gorgeous colour photographs. Just as Israel has brought together every ethnic group, making for a vibrant and colourful tapestry. The Melting Pot has combined well-respected teachers and delicious dishes from across the globe, catering to the reader's physical and spiritual needs.

If you're blessed with a sweet tooth, you'll be irresistibly drawn to Paula Shoyer's The Kosher Baker, published by Brandeis University Press.

This lavishly illustrated book contains more than 160 dairy-free recipes to suit any culinary taste.

Shoyer, the proprietor of a cooking school in Washington, D.C., tells you how to whip up great desserts and breads without having to use butter, cream, milk, cheese, yogurt or other dairy products.

For Shoyer, pareve is the way to go.

The book, complete with a useful index, is divided into several parts.

Requiring 15 minutes of preparation, these quick and elegant desserts include such staples as cookies and biscotti.

Here you will find recipes for favourites like amaretto cookies, chocolate chip mandelbread, vanilla pound cake, pecan coffee cake and date cake.

Two-step desserts, which need 15 to 30 minutes of preparation time, offer recipes for shortbread, Linzer tarts, oatmeal raisin cookies, hamantashen, pecan bars and a glittering array of cakes and pies.

Multiple-step desserts and breads, which need more than 30 minutes of preparation, include rugelach, truffles, layered cakes, babkas, tarts and strudels.

The remaining sections are on challah, special Passover cakes and cookies and low-sugar desserts.

"I have included desserts with no added sugar because diabetes affects so many people in the Jewish community," she writes. "No longer do your diabetic guests have to eat fruit while you eat pastries."

Shoyer's chapter on foolproof tips and techniques is helpful. She tells you how to test the doneness of a cake, how to melt chocolate on the stovetop, how to slice cake layers, and so on.

And be sure to read her chapter on bakeware, tools and equipment. You may be surprised what every serious baker should have at his/her beck and call when in the kitchen.

In short, The Kosher Baker is an important resource for any Jewish or dairy-free household.

A Happy, Healthy and Prosperous New Year.

Brit milah: the metzitzah b'peh controversy

Haredim insist oral suction necessary

Jennifer M. MacLeod
Special to the CJN

Following the death of two babies from herpes – one in 2004 and the other last fall – New York City's Board of Health has issued a proposal that parents sign an informed consent release before a mohel performs a controversial oral suction procedure called metzitzah b'peh.

An estimated two-thirds of baby boys in the haredi community are circumcised in a manner that includes metzitzah b'peh. Rabbi David Zwiebel of Agudath Israel of America told the New York Times last March, when the latest herpes-related death came to light.

The procedure involves a mohel using his mouth to directly clear the wound of blood in the final stage of a ritual circumcision.

But beyond the haredi world, parents may not even know about the issue, says Dr. Aaron Jesin, a Toronto family physician and Orthodox mohel who believes informed consent is a good idea when it comes to metzitzah b'peh. "At least it gets them thinking about what's going on."

One mother whose son was circumcised in Toronto recently told The CJN that her mohel never mentioned it.

"We just thought, 'No one does that anymore,' and didn't realize until too late."

Another Toronto father who was aware of the issue said he "sought an Orthodox mohel who understood our concerns." But he said friends have been "surprised when they learned [it] was used at their bris after the fact."

More than 200 haredi rabbis in the United States have signed a statement opposing the New York City Board of Health proposal and defending the tradition. They say they intend to continue practising it, citing government interference in a religious matter.

"The legislature is going to tell us how to make brissim?" asked one signatory, Rabbi Yisroel Belsky, head of the Yeshiva Torah Vodaas in Brooklyn, N.Y., in a recent cover story of the glossy Orthodox weekly Ami Magazine. "Let's say I'm the head of a New York State legislative body... and one day I walk into the Waldorf Astoria and tell the head chef, 'Listen, there's a new rule about how you have to cook.' He'd say, 'Are you crazy? You're telling me how to cook?'"

Between 2004 and 2011, New York had 11 reported cases of herpes simplex infection following brit milahs. Two boys were left with lasting brain damage. And with at least one past case in Toronto (in 1994) and others in Israel, this is clearly a global problem.

Jesin explained that metzitzah (suction) is the last of three essential brit milah steps, as described in the Mishnah. Metzitzah was included for health reasons, and Jesin said drawing out the blood can clean the wound and introduce white blood cells for healing.

Yet the Mishnah doesn't specify oral suction. In the 19th century, the Chatam Sofer, a leading authority, ruled that oral suction wasn't necessary if a mohel was sick. He also permitted alternative suction methods, and some mohels at the time – who were also newly aware of modern theories of disease transmission – began using a glass tube, the prevailing practice today.

In June, the U.S. Centers for Disease Control issued a statement that "before circumcision, mohelim [sic] should inform both parents whether they perform direct orogenital suction and explain the risk of herpes transmission, so that parents can choose not to have their newborn exposed."

Despite the popular belief that the two strains of herpes (Type 1 and Type 2) correspond, respectively, to oral and genital herpes, either strain can infect either region (or other areas, such as the eyes).

In an adult, herpes can be annoying or painful, but in a vulnerable newborn, herpes causes devastating skin and eye blisters, brain infection and even death. Most cases in babies are transmitted by the mother.

Jesin said he used metzitzah b'peh when he started 33 years ago, "but then I went to a lecture by Rabbi [Moshe] Tendler," the rosh yeshiva of the Rabbi Isaac Elchanan Theological Seminary at Yeshiva University, who holds a PhD in microbiology and has angered many with his stance against metzitzah b'peh.

The Ami Magazine cover article, titled "Taking Action! The fight for metzitzah b'peh," strongly condemns New York City officials and the Centers for Disease Control.

"Mathematically, the number of kids getting infected from metzitzah is so low that it doesn't even weigh in as a percentage," Rabbi Belsky says in the article.

In another article in the same issue, a prominent mohel asserts that all mohels are tested to prove they're herpes-free. Yet it's estimated that between 20 and 50 per cent of the adult population carry the virus (mostly as cold sores). And a study published in the journal Pediatrics concluded that it's possible for an asymptomatic mohel to pass on the disease.

Jesin said that "if you believe metzitzah b'peh is... Halachah from Moshe on [Mount] Sinai, then you will feel very strongly that it's the only way."

Such parents may be willing to accept the risks, but for others who are simply unaware of the practice, Jesin believes they should be informed.

Despite the precarious situation surrounding brit milah in Germany – where a court ruled in June that circumcision violates children's rights, leaving its legality in question – and a growing number of young Jewish parents who are rejecting the rite, Jesin said discussing the issue of metzitzah b'peh can only be a good thing.

"Hiding is not going to help," he said. "You're saying we shouldn't talk about it, shouldn't fix the problem, because [some haredim] are worried?"

By dealing with the issue head-on, "basically you're saying, 'Let's do it safely.'"

Workers clear out God's mailbox for Rosh Hashanah

Aaron Kalman
Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — Workers overseen by Rabbi of the Wall Shmuel Rabinovitch emptied the Western Wall of notes and letters on Monday morning, making room for the prayers and wishes of a new year.

Twice a year, before Rosh Hashanah and Passover, a maintenance crew cleans the notes left in the cracks of the almost 2,000-year-old wall. The letters, which often contain the most personal and private requests or prayers, are buried without being read.

The Western Wall is the holiest site of the Jewish people, and it's a tradition to write down prayers and/or personal requests and place them in the cracks of the Wall.

Over the years, various projects developed around the world to help those who are unable to be in Jerusalem to place notes in the Wall.

For years, young campers at Jewish summer camps in the United States have sent their prayers to Jerusalem with an Israeli staff member, who then would place them in the Wall.

More recently, the official Western Wall website introduced a feature that allowed people to compose a note online and have it printed out and put in the cracks.

Every year, thousands of letters are addressed to God and sent to the Wall from around the world. The Israeli postal service delivers and places them.

Are you an heir?

60,000 assets of Holocaust victims were located in Israel and are waiting to be claimed

Thousands of Jews across Europe invested in pre-state Israel before WWII. These proud Jews believed in the dream of a Jewish State, so they opened bank accounts and bought stocks, bonds and real estate. Many tragically perished at the hands of the Nazis. Their investments did not.

60,000 of these assets have been located by HASHAVA - The Holocaust Restitution Company of Israel. HASHAVA is now seeking rightful heirs, many of whom live in North America.

Haredi soldiers take their spirit to the field

Ben Sales
JTA

TEL AVIV — Like any of the Israeli army's combat battalions, the soldiers of Netzach Yehuda faced a 60-mile hike during basic training meant to simulate battle conditions.

They hiked with their gear at night and during the day, up and down hills and through rough terrain. One night, their commanders told them that their supply trucks had been bombed and they needed to ration whatever food and water they had left.

Finishing the hike, they put down their gear and caught their breath. As a band played traditional Jewish wedding tunes, they began to dance as if one of the soldiers had just been married.

Popularly known as the Nahal Haredi, Netzach Yehuda is the haredi division of the Israeli army, and its combat and reserve forces number several thousands of men.

For decades, haredi men in Israel have received exemptions from otherwise mandatory service in the Israel Defence Forces, so that they could study in yeshivas. Many are non-Zionist or anti-Zionist, and mass protests erupted in haredi neighbourhoods this summer when the government came close to passing a law requiring haredi men to serve. Even if a law were to be passed, some supporters of mandatory haredi service question the army's ability to accommodate thousands of new draftees who require stringent kosher certification and eschew any contact, especially physical, with women.

Netzach Yehuda has attempted to address those issues on a smaller scale. And though the organization says that the IDF sometimes falls short in its efforts to accommodate the battalion, its soldiers and administrators feel that since its founding in 1999, the program has worked.

"It's a little more of a Torah atmosphere," said Yehuda Cohen, 20, a haredi student who is serving in Netzach Yehuda. "There are fewer problems with prayer and army regulations."

After they finish training, Netzach Yehuda soldiers serve in and around the West Bank Palestinian city of Jenin, fulfilling the same duties as other combat units. But when they're not on combat missions, the soldiers' schedule includes time for three daily minyanim, including at least 45 minutes for the morning service. A synagogue always stands close to their barracks, giving the soldiers a space to pray or learn a page of Talmud during breaks. Rabbis occasionally come to their bases to teach Torah.

In addition, the battalion's food is mehadrin kosher, an especially stringent certification. And the soldiers receive ritual fringes on a green rather than white undergarment, so that it will match their combat uniforms.

Netzach Yehuda's soldiers have little if any direct contact with women, which accords with the strict gender separation in haredi communities. While women often teach fitness classes in the IDF, men run those classes for the haredi soldiers.

"They come back and they're even stronger from a religious viewpoint than when they came in," said Rabbi Izvi Kledanow, head of the Netzach Yehuda nonprofit that runs the battalion jointly with the army and Defence Ministry. "The environment is a very positive environment. It has everything it requires to avail itself to a haredi young man."

But Rabbi Kledanow was quick to note that although the army accommodates the Haredi soldiers attend a swearing-in ceremony as they enter the Netzach Yehuda unit of the Israel Defence Forces. (Flash90 photo)

haredi soldiers, the soldiers don't necessarily enter Netzach Yehuda supporting the army.

"They're not Zionist at all," Rabbi Kledanow said. "Not only are they not Zionist, but their education is anti-Zionist."

He said the soldiers enlist because "not every haredi boy is cut out to sit and learn 12 to 14 hours in yeshiva every day. They feel they need a different life, and in order to work, you have to do the army."

That pragmatic line of thinking stands in contrast to the official position of Israel's haredi leaders and much of their rank and file, which remains opposed to the idea of haredi army service even as the government tries to mandate it. A large portion of haredim are opposed to or agnostic toward Zionism.

"Everyone out there is a sinner," said Cohen, a student at Yeshivat Porat Yosef in Jerusalem's Old City. "The Land of Israel belongs to Jews if they keep the Torah. If there's no Torah, we don't deserve the land."

Such communal attitudes make returning to haredi life difficult for Netzach Yehuda soldiers. Because "to marry a boy that was in the army is a no-no, Yehuda helps the battalion's veterans to find matches for marriage and then helps them fund their weddings, if necessary," Rabbi Kledanow said.

Serving in a combat unit also poses challenges to men raised in strictly observant communities, as they must perform missions and guard duty on Shabbat and Jewish holidays. But the battalion consults a rabbi who tries to minimize those occurrences, while Netzach Yehuda soldiers do what they can to perform rituals regardless of where they are.

Israel to advocate for Jewish refugees

Yoel Goldman
The Times of Israel

JERUSALEM—Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Deputy Foreign Minister Danny Ayalon vowed Sunday to promote the issue of Jewish refugees from Arab lands despite the possible negative political implications for the Israeli-Palestinian peace process.

Netanyahu, speaking via a pre-recorded message at the international justice for Jewish Refugees from Arab Countries conference in Jerusalem, said he raises the issue of Jewish refugees wherever he goes.

"The Arab world has neglected Arab refugees for decades and has used them as a battering ram against Israel, while Israel, who was just born as a nation-state, has managed to absorb and resettle the Jewish refugees from Arab countries and turn them into productive citizens," said the prime minister.

"This government has decided to promote the issue, and therefore I raise this issue as well everywhere I go," he added.

Ayalon, who last week launched an online advocacy campaign titled "I Am A Refugee," told the conference that the "issue of refugees from the Middle East has two sides. Granted, there are Palestinian refugees, but there is a larger number of Jewish refugees from Arab countries."

Ayalon was referring to hundreds of thousands of Jews who fled Middle Eastern and North African countries at the time of Israel's establishment, most of them heading to Israel. Ayalon's campaign aims to raise this issue in part as a counter to Palestinian demands for a "right of return" for Arabs who left what is today Israel at around the same time.

The Palestinians claim that millions of fourth-generation descendants of those Arabs should be allowed to "return" to Israel under a peace agreement – a demand that would demographically end Israel as a Jewish state. Israel argues that Arab refugee descendants should be absorbed in the new "Palestine" under a peace accord, just as Israel absorbed the Jewish refugees.

Ayalon, too, emphasized the Netanyahu administration's focus on the matter. "The Israeli government has decided to put its full force behind this issue, of which there are political implications, in particular regarding peace negotiations," he said.

The deputy foreign minister's nascent campaign has already been the subject of criticism in the Arab world.

In a letter to Arab League Secretary General Nabil Elaraby, Hamas called on the league's member states to combat Ayalon's campaign.

The organization claimed in the missive that Jews had never suffered discrimination or persecution in Arab countries, where they resided for centuries. It was the Zionist movement, Hamas argued, which caused Jews to leave – a fact well documented by "Jewish researchers and officials."

The letter also appealed to the Arab League to withdraw the Arab Peace Initiative.

Ma'ariv daily sold

JTA

JERUSALEM—The Israeli daily newspaper Ma'ariv has reportedly been sold to the publisher of the right-wing nationalist newspaper Makor Rishon.

The $21-million (US) sale, which does not include Ma'ariv's debts or publishing house, will be completed by October, the Israeli business daily Globes reported Sunday. Israeli businessman Nochi Danker owns Ma'ariv.

Makor Rishon publisher Shlomo Ben-Tzvi plans to continue operating Ma'ariv as a newspaper, according to a notice from Ma'ariv Holdings Ltd. to the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange, Globes reported. Ben-Tzvi will also offer to hire as many as 400 Ma'ariv employees, the notice said – the paper has about 2,000 employees.

As part of the sale, Ben-Tzvi is also acquiring the NRG website, a chain of local newspapers, magazines, intellectual property rights, and the newspaper's clients and subscribers, according to the Calcalist business news service.

Earlier this month, the board of Discount Investment Corp., which is owned by Danker, agreed to put more than $3 million into Ma'ariv and sell its printing house. Ma'ariv was reportedly going to cease publishing on a daily basis, only producing a weekend edition while providing updated daily Internet news.

Chag Samayach from Shimon Peres

As we stand poised on the threshold of the New Year, it is my distinct pleasure to convey my heartfelt good wishes to all the Jewish communities around the world, in my name and on behalf of your brethren in Israel, eager to embark upon another year with hope and optimism.

As a small country with so very few natural resources, we are doubly proud of the human resources that Israel has generated and that represent the most valuable capital to which a country can aspire.

Shimon Peres

From our soil have emerged Nobel Prize laureates and the spirit of innovation, creativity and daring. These achievements have put us at the forefront of scientific and technological advances and inspired our designation as a 'start-up nation.'

We cope with issues such as water and food scarcity by developing groundbreaking solutions in research and development, and continue to explore new frontiers that will revolutionize our lives such as the field of brain research, which promises to unlock the yet-to-be-deciphered mysteries of the human brain and do much to enhance the well-being of humanity. We look upon the Jewish communities around the world not only as our extended family, but also as our full partners, and feel it is imperative that our deep-rooted Jewish bonds continue to be safeguarded, cultivated and brought to fruition.

The young generation is our future's promise. Its engagement in the cause of building a brighter tomorrow for Jews in Israel and around the world is key to our success. Educational programs, regular visits to Israel, first-hand experiences and people-to-people meetings have made their mark and serve to build the bridges that unite us.

These bridges are firmly rooted in the heritage of values which we share. Beyond the commitment which we uphold to each other, we must never fail to recall our duty to better the world around us, in keeping with the fundamentally Jewish concept of tikkun olam. Throughout history, the Jewish people have contributed to society their greatest aptitude – dissatisfaction. Always striving for a better tomorrow, our people have attained results to be proud of. Today, we perpetuate this legacy through our dedication to moral values, our drive towards knowledge and our unyielding pursuit for peace. It is this call for participating in the ceaseless march of humanity in our unique way which unites us.

Once again at the dawn of a new year, we stand upon the ancient pillars of morality, knowledge and peace, facing the challenges and opportunities that lie ahead and gazing upon the future of our people and of the world. Our unity is our anchor, our moral call is our wind. Both will help us chart the way towards a horizon of growth, security and well-being for the Jewish people and a brighter tomorrow for humanity at large.

From Jerusalem, my friends, I want to wish the Jewish people the world over a happy, peaceful, healthy and prosperous year.

Shanah Tovah u'metuka!

Barak 'impressed' by U.S. fleet

Israel's defence minister Ehud Barak called the recent deployment of U.S. forces in the Persian Gulf "impressive" and suggested that the United States is prepared to deal with Iran. "Israel reserves the right to make sovereign decisions, and the United States respects that, but no mistake should be made regarding the impressive scope of the American preparations to deal with the Iranian challenge on all levels," Barak said last Thursday at a political gathering. He said that while there are differences between the Israeli and U.S. points of view on Iran, "the U.S. is our most important ally. The intelligence co-operation and security backing Israel receives at present is exceptional in its scope."

Olmert sentenced

Former Israeli prime minister Ehud Olmert was sentenced to six months of community service for a breach of trust conviction. This past July, the Jerusalem District Court acquitted Olmert on charges of fraud, breach of trust, tax evasion and falsifying corporate records in what became known as the Talansky and Rishon Tours affairs. He was found guilty on a lesser charge of breach of trust in another matter known as the Investment Center case. Olmert is the first former Israeli prime minister ever to stand trial. He resigned as prime minister in September 2008 after police investigators recommended that he be indicted.

Toytown marks 60th year in business

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

If you're going to go toe-to-toe with a big box store, you're likely not going to outslug them on price.

Instead, you've got to have something else to offer your customers, something the Toys 'R' Us and the Walmarts of the world can't match.

Shari Bricks Zeiler, owner and manager of Toytown, a boutique store on Avenue Road, believes she's found the formula for success and longevity: offer better service, knowledgeable sales staff and a unique inventory of hard-to-find toys to distinguish herself from other toy retailers.

Toytown is a medium-sized neighbourhood store in an area full of small-scaled businesses. The store is celebrating its 60th anniversary this year, though the Bricks family has operated it only since 1984.

Visiting the store, you can quickly witness their formula for success.

At the counter, one of the staff demonstrates one of this season's more popular items, Speed Stacks – stacking cups that have spawned an Olympic-style sport, complete with champions and competitions. Another salesperson, asked about an obscure game of Ligretto Dice – at least one I'd never heard about – describes in detail how the game works.

On the shelves you'll find imported French craft kits by Djeco and Alex Toys. There's also Playpus and Alex All Duct Out designer duct tape – Red Green must be kvelling like crazy, although this duct tape is not a handyman's secret weapon. They are multi-coloured and patterned and useful for making jewelry and belts.

There are zipper bracelets, made from the same material used to construct braces for teeth, and for the boys there are some interesting copy, trace and draw colouring books featuring super heroes like Batman and the Green Arrow.

Of course there are also the standard games like Monopoly, Battleship and Hedbanz, but parents concerned about their children's over-exposure to mind-numbing computer and video games will be pleased to note the store does not carry any of them.

As a mother of two young girls, Bricks Zeiler has seen the benefits of old-fashioned board games and the negative effects of electronic games, which grab a kid's attention and won't let go.

"I think with the advent of electronic devices, parents rely on them more than the kids do to keep them entertained," she said. "Computers keep kids out of our hair," she continued, "but we get a lot of people coming in for a 10-year-old boy who only wants to play with the computer."

Kids get "grumpy" if they're constantly playing in front of a screen, but if you give them a chance, they enjoy themselves with board games and other toys.

"If you have an electronics-free day, the dog, the kids, the parents all get attention," and playing board games is a good way for families to spend time together and for kids to interact with each other, she said.

Plus, many games have a built-in learning component, she added.

When it comes to learning about the business, Bricks Zeiler did it the old-fashioned way – on the job.

Her parents, Harry and Andrea, bought the store from the Pollick family in the mid-1980s. The Pollicks founded it in 1952 in another location just down the street on Avenue Road.

The Pollicks were known for matching children with the perfect toy and saw the Bricks as maintaining that tradition.

Ironically, Bricks Zeiler doesn't recall a plethora of toys in her life as a young girl. Of course, there were dolls and games and a few tchotchke, but shelves full of toys – that was something new, even for her.

As a young girl, she worked in the store on weekends and after school. While at university, where she studied Spanish and linguistics, she put in time on weekends and holidays.

"It was a real part of my formative years. It stayed with me – the work ethic, how to connect with people. I was a real shy kid."

"In retail, you need a lot of positive energy and you always have to have a smile on your face," she said. "I think this is the kind of business that is in you from the beginning. You have to live it."

"By trial and error I figured out how to use the accounting system, pay bills on time, pay the staff on time," she said.

She doesn't budget for advertising. Instead she relies on her customers to spread the word about the quality of the store.

Toytown is profitable, she said. "It's not a multimillion-dollar business, it's a small business.... It's very hands-on."

She worked side by side with her father until he suffered a stroke five years ago.

"It's a labour of love. I love my staff, my customers. I love that my kids see a thriving business that their mother runs, that their mother works hard and still has time for the family."

Some of the stores' merchandise is relatively low-margin, but Bricks Zeiler stocks it because "we believe in it."

Bricks Zeiler is bringing her two girls, aged 10 and seven, into the business, slowly. Not only are they great product testers, but she's paying them for small jobs so they learn the connection between work and money.

Judging from the bustle in the store one recent weekday, Toytown remains a going concern. Bricks Zeiler acknowledges she's had offers to expand to a second location, in a mall.

But, "we feel we want to be more of a destination," she said. "If we open another store it will no longer be a labour of love."

New Facebook app spices up holiday menu

JNS.org

NEW YORK — There's a new Facebook app for those seeking to spice up their Rosh Hashanah menu this year – as well as that of their family and friends.

The American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC) has launched a Facebook app in advance of the new year that enables users to send e-Recipe cards to one another. The app also connects them with Jewish communities far and wide and flavours of the Jewish New Year the world over," stated the humanitarian group, which operates in more than 70 countries. Among the exotic recipes available through the app are leek fritas from Turkey and corn-flour/coconut halava from India.

Israeli painter finds quick success in Toronto

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

In the two years since Israeli-born painter Irit Epstein moved to Toronto, she has already managed to carve out her place in the city's art scene.

Epstein's solo exhibit at the Bezpala Brown Gallery is titled Rising Beyond the Body, and comes to a close on Sept. 13. She spoke to The C/JN about her collection of "figurative and surrealist works," as well as her career, which has spanned three decades.

"I've always painted for about 30 years, since I was 20, 25," Epstein said, adding that in addition to being formally trained, painting has always come naturally to her.

"It's not hard. It's part of me, but it's hard sometimes to be satisfied and say, 'This is finished, this is good.' It's an outlet and it's something I need to do."

Epstein obtained a master's in fine arts from the Academy of Art in Berlin in 1985, before relocating to New York City where she earned another master's degree from New York University in art therapy in 1990.

"I worked in mental hospitals and day-care centres in New York, Miami and Israel, treating people with various mental illnesses and conditions using art... It was used for diagnosis and treatment," Epstein said.

Since 1996, she's presented solo exhibitions in galleries all over Israel, including the Tiroche Gallery in Jaffa, the Sara Erman Gallery in Tel Aviv, and the Tel Aviv Performing Arts Center, as well as in group exhibitions at the Association of Painters and Sculptors in Tel Aviv, The Winery at Rishon LeZion, and the Bible Museum in Tel Aviv.

Epstein has also contributed to group exhibitions in Italy, Germany, and Mexico.

Since moving to Toronto with her children and Montreal-born husband in 2010, Epstein has presented her collections in two Toronto galleries.

She said although there are a few noticeable differences between the art scenes in Toronto and Israel, overall they are difficult to compare.

"There are many more galleries here, more variety, different styles – it's a little bit more rich. I mean, Israel is a very rich place in arts... but each artist is different so it's hard to compare Israel to Toronto," Epstein said.

"In each artist I see different things. Art is a universal language."

Her current showing at the Bezpala Brown Gallery isn't the first time she's displayed her work there.

Earlier this year, she exhibited her work as part of Bezpala's Lastin project, which was established "to explore and identify emerging Canadian and international talent."

"I participated in one of their past group exhibitions and I won their Jury Award for my work and they expressed interest and offered me this solo exhibition."

In trying to describe her style and what inspires her work, Epstein said each series of paintings has "its own objective that evolves through time and is connected to a specific geographic time and place. My paintings are a personal diary, like a journey within myself, something that is continuous."

"They are basically a dialogue with me and the environment. I integrate concrete images and abstract forms, colours... I'm trying to convey an impression of my inner self."

She said her latest show, which runs until Thursday, presents paintings of "lengthened figures that are extended and they express the connection between me and others, and they look frozen in place and they express a moment that is suspended in time and they are supposed to enable a discovery of a specific moment."

In a written description of the collection, Epstein wrote that the "motivating force in these paintings is the power of personal growth as a center of gravity that maintains stability and equilibrium."

"For this purpose, one needs the ability to rise up, not only as a body but beyond it, as a symbol for an emotional state aiming to balance, as the fall is always concealed and lying in wait."

A painting by Irit Epstein from her Rising Beyond the Body collection presented at the Bezpala Brown Gallery.

She added that the personal growth is portrayed in the lengthened figures, "extended as if from within to the edge of the canvas, as an expression of the developing connection to one's self and to others."

Film about drummer Buddy Rich

JNS.org

To the late Buddy Rich, playing drums in jazz bands was everything – so much so that when he was in his last days, he asked his only daughter to keep his legacy alive. After the legendary drummer died in 1987, his daughter, Cathy, worked tirelessly to preserve her dad's memory, organizing memorial concerts and touring with his band. Now, she is embarking on a new project – a documentary film about the great drummer's life called Welcome to Nutville.

Many experts say Rich, who was born in Brooklyn, N.Y., to Jewish vaudevillians Robert and Bess Rich, was the greatest drummer who ever lived. However, there has never been a full-length documentary on his life and continued influence. Cathy Rich hopes to change that.

HIGH HOLIDAY FARE: TIFF TO SCREEN ISRAELI DOC ON EICHMANN'S HANGMAN

The Toronto Jewish Film Festival has announced it intends to honour the special time of reflection between Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur by presenting a screening of the Israeli documentary The Hangman (2010), directed by Natalie Braun.

The film is a complex and unforgettable portrait of the marginalized Sephardi prison warden who became Adolf Eichmann's executioner. Forever affected by this event, he eventually becomes a shochet and performs the ceremony of kapparot before Yom Kippur, assisting others with their atonement.

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein is a guest speaker at the screening, which is being co-presented by the Ashkenaz Festival. Hebrew with English subtitles. The film contains some graphic imagery. Varsity Cinema, Wednesday, Sept. 19, 7:30 p.m. www.tjff.com or 416-324-9121.

Photo Exhibit: Where Two Worlds Meet – Italy and Israel is a photographic journey by Beverley Abramson and Neil Dankoff, presented by the Jerusalem Foundation and Villa Charities in conjunction with the event Saluti a Jerusalem. Joseph D. Carrier Gallery, Columbus Centre, 901 Lawrence Ave. W. Open (free admission) Sept. 13 to Oct. 1. Opening reception, Wednesday, Sept. 12, 7:30 p.m. Artist talk, Thursday, Sept. 20, 7:30 p.m.

Names in the News: There are dozens of territories around the globe claimed by one people and occupied by another, yet many westerners seem preoccupied with the Palestinian territories (the historic regions of Judea and Samaria).

This may be true of the acclaimed and knighted British playwright David Hare, who several years ago wrote a dramatic monologue called The Wall about the separation barrier between Israel and the Palestinian territories. It may also be true of Alberta filmmaker Cam Christiansen, who is working with the National Film Board of Canada to produce an animated film of The Wall featuring Hare in animated form.

Filming of Hare took place in a motion-capture studio in London, England, last December, and work is proceeding to create a "visually rich and imaginatively complex world" to surround him and give depth to his "unique, deeply personal and nuanced perspectives on the history and philosophy of the separation barrier," an NFB press release explains. The separation barrier "is planned to be over four times as long as the Berlin Wall and, in some place, twice as high," it continues.

Utilizing a collage of motion capture, illustration, photography, live action and handcrafted classic animation techniques, the film is due to be finished some time in 2014.

Out of Town: Beyond Pop Art, the first North American retrospective showing of the art of Tom Wesselmann, is a surprisingly accessible and delightful exhibition of the work of the late brilliant American artist (1931-2004), currently on view at the Montreal Museum of Fine Arts. Like Andy Warhol and Roy Lichtenstein, Wesselmann borrowed heavily from American popular culture, particularly from the 1950s and 1960s. He also uses iconic imagery from masters such as Picasso, Matisse and Van Gogh. Whether depicting reclining nudes, gigantic lipsticks or a sleek and shiny VW bug cardboard cutout against a cardboard landscape, Wesselmann celebrates and elevates popular forms in a powerful and original way. The museum's installation is also particularly effective. On view until Oct. 7. Sherbrooke St. W. at Crescent. www.mbam.qc.ca

TORONTO JEWISH FILM FESTIVAL PRESENTS

THE HANGMAN

To honour the time of reflection between Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur, the Toronto Jewish Film Festival is proud to offer a special screening of an internationally celebrated Israeli documentary.

An unforgettable and complex portrait of the marginalized Sephardi prison warden that became Adolf Eichmann's executioner. Forever affected by this event, he eventually becomes a shochet (ritual slaughterer) and performs the ceremony of Kapparot before Yom Kippur, assisting others with their atonement. "He does not however fit any of our stereotypes of an ultra-orthodox Sephardi man. This is a film about giving voice to an individual who we do not usually have the opportunity to encounter. His humanity and compassion come through loud and clear!" —Israeli film scholar Amy Kronish.

Globe reporter debunks myth of Muslim takeover

Joseph Serge
Arts Editor

When Anders Behring Breivik went on a shooting spree that left 69 dead at a Norwegian summer camp a year ago, he left behind a manifesto that ran to 1,518 densely typed pages. In it, he proselytized his conviction that Muslims will make up a majority of Europe's population by 2080.

Breivik's alarmist sentiments were hardly original and stemmed from the writings and blogs of many mainstream right-wing western writers, including Daniel Pipes, Patrick Buchanan and Canadian Mark Steyn.

The core of their widely popular beliefs is that Muslim immigrants are increasing their numbers, are loyal only to Islam and promote a political agenda that will destroy our traditions and freedoms. In short, they argue, we are about to be swept by a Muslim tide.

But, writes Doug Saunders in his book The Myth of the Muslim Tide: Do Immigrants Threaten The West (Knopf Canada), the idea of a stealth takeover by Islamic believers is a delusion. Muslim immigrants, he sets out to prove, are no more different than the earlier larger waves of religious minorities, particularly Roman Catholics and Jews.

In fact, like Breivik's manifesto, the arguments brought forth by the right wing bloggers aren't entirely original either. The arrival of millions of people from poor religious minority backgrounds in western countries has always been a traumatic affair, one that has bred fear, ignorance and prejudice.

American Freedom and Catholic Power, a bestselling book in the 1950s in America, stated that Catholics would eventually gain control of the presidency and install divine law, making the United States a Catholic republic.

I need not remind readers of the claims made about Jewish immigrants – that they were a disloyal, fast-breeding fifth column bent upon imposing foreign religious laws to "Jewify" the society around them.

Saunders, a Globe and Mail correspondent and author of Donner Prize-winning Arrival City, sets about disputing the claims one by one, using facts from scores of demographic studies, surveys and historical documentation to prove his points. Saunders says he's not out to defend Islam, but rather to debunk the myths and also highlight the genuinely alarming facts.

The book follows a consistent pattern. He begins with one of these alarmist myths, provides a quote or two from the writers that espouse it and then goes about debunking it.

The key argument used by the "Muslim-tiders" is that the Muslim majority in the West is growing fast and will soon become a majority in Europe. They believe that Europe is on the verge of becoming "Eurabia."

For instance, Canadian conservative commentator Steyn, Saunders says, has recently argued that every European under the age of 75 is all but guaranteed to end his or her days living in an Islamified

From the Donner Prize-winning author of ARRIVAL CITY

Europe. In a 2010 campaign speech during his run for the U.S. Republican presidential nomination, Newt Gingrich referenced "stealth jihad," the idea that Muslims are taking over the West by immigration and breeding.

Saunders sets to debunk this by using various studies and statistics.

He examines one study conducted by the Washington, D.C.-based Pew Research Center and concludes that "there are no signs of Muslims becoming a European majority or even a very large minority."

Muslims currently make up less than four per cent of the population of the European Union. Examining studies and surveys, Saunders says the rate of Muslim growth will probably level off and reach around eight per cent by 2050.

Things aren't much different in North America. In the United States, the Muslim population will double over the next 20 years, but that would still leave them at less than two per cent of the general population, around the same as Jews.

In Canada, the Muslim population is expected to triple to just 6.6 per cent of the population in 20 years.

None of the studies (including one by the U.S. Congressional Research Service) predict anything close to a Muslim majority.

Muslims, Saunders argues, are also not reproducing faster than any other people. While he admits that immigrants do tend to have larger families, this stops within a generation or two, and Muslims in the West are not having more babies than the indigenous population. There is no conspiracy of deliberate growth, no invasion by reproductive means.

He highlights one alarmist fact that went viral recently. In 2010 a report showed that the most common name for newborn boys in Britain was Mohammed. This was evidence that fuelled the conspiracy theorists' claim that Muslims were taking over the population.

While this statistic was correct, the alarmists ignored the fact that Muslims tend to have far less variety in their names than non-Muslims. Generally, non-Muslims have preferences for unusual, unique names, and you'd be hard-pressed to find a Snooki or a Moon Unit in Muslim households.

In 2010, Saunders writes, the year that Mohammed was the most popular name for newborns in Britain. Muslim boys made up just one per cent of British newborns.

Saunders also points out that Muslim immigrants are following the same trends as earlier ethnic immigration: from big families and rapid growth in the first couple of decades to "a gradual blending into the fertility patterns of the host population later on."

In the same manner he debunks several other misconceptions:

Immigration, he says, is not a Muslim monopoly, and certainly not an Islamic plot. Most immigrants to the West are not Muslim (the only exception being France, due to its former North African colonies).

Muslim immigrants, he also argues, are not overwhelmingly guided by their religious beliefs. In France, for instance, less than five per cent of Muslims attend a mosque every Friday. Almost no French Muslims send their children to separate Islamic schools, and 42 per cent of French Muslims support the ban on hijabs and other religious items in schools.

In America, he says, "even on the explosive issue of Palestinian-Israeli relations, Muslim immigrants are abandoning the views of their home countries and falling into the American mainstream.

"In general, while [Muslim] values still lag behind those of non-immigrant neighbours... immigrants of Muslim origin are very clearly progressing toward integration at a rapid pace."

The loyalties of most Muslim immigrants are not tied to their birthplace or religion, Saunders says, and Muslims are not isolating themselves into ghettos or "parallel societies" out of choice (though he concedes that poverty does drive them into low income housing). He also dismisses the claim that terrorism is a natural and inevitable extension of fundamentalist Islamic faith.

In his well-researched book, Saunders is saying that while there are some legitimate fears and we should be vigilant, we should not forget our own immigrant experiences. Tides come and go, he warns. The same pattern is repeated.

By the very nature of the work, the reader will be overwhelmed with numbers and percentages, and arguably numbers can be misleading. Otherwise, this concise, slim volume is easily accessible, and because it sets out to disprove popular, but misguided, hateful messages, it should be placed on the must-read list, lest we repeat previous tragedies.

Paralympics help wheelchair tennis ace improve

David Grossman
Special to the CJN

It might come as a surprise to some, but Canadian wheelchair men's singles tennis champ Joel Dembe said he went to the Paralympic Games in England to get better, but he wasn't expecting to win a medal.

That despite the fact the 28-year-old — believed to be the only Jewish athlete on the Canadian contingent of 145 athletes — says he's playing the best tennis of his career.

Facing athletes from Great Britain in the opening rounds of the men's singles and men's doubles competitions didn't help either, with the crowds cheering on the local favourites.

Dembe was no match for 23-year-old Dave Phillopson of Great Britain, losing 6-2, 6-2 at Eton Manor in London, eliminating the Canadian from the men's singles medal competition.

Things didn't get any better in men's doubles, as Marc McCarroll and Gordon Reid beat Dembe and partner Philippe Beaudard 6-3, 6-1.

Born in Hamilton, Dembe has lived in Toronto for the past four years.

His passion for tennis was so great that he quit his job as a marketing analyst with

TD Bank a year and a half ago to focus on the sport.

"To be the best, I had to commit to tennis full time," said Dembe. "It was my choice, and that meant I had to leave a good job and spend a minimum of 15 hours a week on the tennis court."

Yet despite being the Canadian champ, he said he wasn't expected to win any medals. But the No. 32-ranked player in the world said that just getting to his first "major international event," one that draws the top physically disabled athletes in the world, was a huge reward in itself.

"I have to be realistic," Dembe, a graduate of the sports management program at Brock University in St. Catharines, said in an interview before heading to the Games. "These are the best [players] in the world, and strange things happen in sport, but let's just say that I'm still improving. The plan is to use this as an opportunity to reach my personal best."

As for reaching the biggest event for physically disabled athletes, he was quick to say that his success didn't happen overnight.

"Hard work, dedication and a commitment to keep working on getting my performance better than the previous day — that's what it's all about," he said.

"When I feel I am not improving, I will put the racquet away, but I've got a way to go."

Dembe was born with two benign tumours near his spine that needed to be removed surgically or his life would have been in jeopardy. His parents decided to go through with the operation, but he was eventually left partially paralyzed.

At age 14, he took up wheelchair tennis.

Although Dembe had been quite active in a variety of sports as a youngster, tennis really took over his life when he met Frank Peter, one of Canada's top wheelchair tennis players, about 10 years ago. After lots of instruction, combined with work on his power, speed and eye-hand co-ordination, Dembe was on his way.

His specialties are his strong serve and forehand.

Dembe won the singles title at the Guadalajara Wheelchair Open earlier this year, took part in the BNP Paribas World Team Cup Americas tourney in Mexico and represented Canada at the World Team Cup this past May in Seoul. He was in South Korea when he learned he was being chosen for Canada's Paralympic Team.

Named Canada's male wheelchair athlete of the year in 2011, Dembe doesn't want sympathy because of his disability.

"I've always had a chip on my shoulder, because I don't want to be treated any differently than others," he said. "I don't want a tennis title handed to me on a silver platter. I want to earn it."

Dembe's trip to England was preceded by a May stopover in Tel Aviv for the Israeli Open. Again, he came up short on the court, losing in the quarterfinals.

"It may not have been my best tennis, but it was a good experience," said Dembe, who hopes to compete in Toronto at the 2015 Pan Am Games. "What drives me a great deal is that I am very fortunate to be surrounded by some great people — coaches, family and friends."

Schachter, Hatch win beach volleyball championship

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Sam Schachter's season didn't start out so well, but it sure ended with a bang.

Schachter, 22, along with partner Maverick Hatch, were recently crowned Canadian champions at the Volleyball Canada Beach Nationals in Vancouver.

Schachter, of Richmond Hill, Ont., and Hatch of Comox, B.C. edged Chaim Schalk of Red Deer, Alta., and Matt Zbyszewski of Toronto 19-21, 21-16 and 18-16 in the championship match.

"It felt pretty great," Schachter said afterward. "It was the national championship. It's good to have on the resumé. It's good to know you can get to that level."

It's pretty apparent Schachter has been competing at the elite level for some time now. At 18, he was a national junior champion. A couple of years later, he teamed with Garrett May to win the under-21 world beach volleyball championships in Antalya, Turkey — a feat never before accomplished by any Canadian team. In 2010, he was voted junior athlete of the year at the Canadian Sports Awards, and in 2011, he and Hatch finished second at the Canadian nationals.

They've been playing well as of late, but the pair were eliminated from Olympic qualification early in the season. "We didn't have a great start," Schachter acknowledged. Still, they entered the nationals seeded number 3, but got a scare in their third game — they lost in three sets — that put them on the "loser's side" in the double elimination event.

In the next game, they were pushed hard by Daniel Dearing and Schachter's former partner, Garrett May, but prevailed 25-23 and 21-19. They swept the semis in two games and split the first two games in the championship series. "We were up in the third set. We were winning and had a couple of match points, but we didn't close," he said. "We were up and then Maverick scored the winning serve."

Back in 2008, volleyball maven George Shermer, who coached Schachter as a youngster, predicted great things from his former protégé. "He's got the right size, tremendous athletic abilities, and he comes from a very good family background. He's got all the tools to succeed."

With the Canadian nationals behind him, Schachter has turned his attention to his education. He's one year away from a degree in communications at Wilfrid Laurier University. At the same time, he's continuing to train with the national team at The Hangar in Downsview Park in Toronto.

Ultimately, his goal is to represent Canada at the 2016 Olympic Games in Brazil.

"The end game is always working for the Olympics," he said. "Everything is geared for the Olympics."

Documentary explores the roots of Al Qaeda

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

American journalist Lawrence Wright is the author of The Looming Tower: Al Qaeda and the Road to 9/11, one of the finest accounts of the Arab terrorist attacks that prompted the United States to invade Afghanistan and launch a war against international terrorism.

In his instructive documentary film, My Trip to Al Qaeda, which was originally broadcast by HBO in 2010 and released by Entertainment One Films Canada Inc. recently, Wright recalls his experiences in researching his book, and ruminates on the nature of Al Qaeda and Islamic radicalism.

"I want to find out who all those people are," he says in a brief mission statement in reference to Muslim extremists who resort to violence in an attempt to achieve their objectives.

Although Wright projects an aura of objectivity, he is clearly hostile to militants like Osama bin Laden, one of the founders of Al Qaeda and its spiritual leader until his assassination last year by U.S. commandos in Pakistan.

Wright claims he became an extremist, as well as an opponent of the royal family in Saudi Arabia, by virtue of the 1979 siege of the Grand Mosque in Mecca and the deployment of American forces on Saudi soil after Iraq's invasion of Kuwait in 1990.

Al Qaeda itself was founded two years earlier by Bin Laden in Pakistan, he points out.

In Wright's view, Bin Laden established Al Qaeda out of a longing for vengeance. He describes it as "an engine that runs on the grievances of Muslims."

Al Qaeda, he adds somewhat sarcastically, offered embittered Muslims an opportunity to make history by becoming suicide bombers and gaining admission to paradise.

The 19 hijackers who slammed commercial airliners into the Twin Towers in New York City and the Pentagon in Washington, D.C., on Sept. 11, 2001, were assured that death and martyrdom would be infinitely better than life.

Wright claims that Egyptian prisons were incubators for Islamic terrorists because torture was commonly practised there on its inmates.

Egyptians who entered prisons as Islamists came out as jihadists, he says, referring to Ayman al Zawahiri, Bin Laden's second-in-command, and others.

My Trip to Al Qaeda helps us understand the roots of Muslim disaffection and the desire of some Muslims to "martyr" themselves.

Engineer invents voice-controlled computer

Rita Poliakov
Special to The CJN

Leor Grebler was eight years old when he created his first invention.

"I was making a new type of what I thought was a really genius type of compost," said Grebler, an engineer living in Toronto.

"It was just a bunch of dirt I'd collected. It wasn't anything really miraculous back then, but I always was drawn to inventing something. I was always pursuing these strange subjects."

As the son of an engineer, Grebler was fascinated by the idea of creating a new product from scratch.

"I've watched these shows, like Wonderstruck [a children's science show] on CBC. I'd visit the science museum and I was always thinking, 'You can dream up something in your mind and you can make it afterwards.' That idea I found really cool."

Now, at 30, Grebler works with an engineering firm that creates teaching and research equipment for colleges and universities. He teamed up with two colleagues to design Ubi, a new type of voice-activated computer. Short for ubiquitous computer, Ubi is a portable device that plugs into the wall.

It's always on, is able to answer questions by searching the Internet, can make phone calls and check emails. About two weeks ago, Grebler and his team put up the product on Kickstarter, a website where people can fund creative projects.

So far, the group has more than $120,000 in funding. Its original goal was $36,000.

"We're really taken aback by how much support we've received," said Grebler. "[Kickstarter] proved to us that we're onto something that resonates with a lot of people. Probably a lot of geeks like myself."

While Grebler currently lives in Toronto, he was born in Ottawa and was part of a small, tight knit Jewish community.

"I went to Yitzhak Rabin High School. There were 20 students in the entire school. It was in a basement of another school," he said. "We were the small Jewish school in the dark basement. People would be weirded out by it, but it was a lot of fun."

Grebler's parents emigrated from Israel and became immersed in Ottawa's Jewish community.

"My mother taught at the Hebrew school there," he said. "[The community] was much smaller. One kosher [restaurant] would open up and people would make such a big deal. Now, of course, in Toronto, it's no big deal at all."

Grebler's involvement in his community almost influenced his career choice.

"I kind of drifted all across the map in what I wanted to do. When I first got out of high school, I wanted to get into Israeli politics. I was so intrigued by Israel," he said.

But eventually, his affinity for science took over.

"My father was an engineer. He had an influence on me. I was always interested in sciences and technology. I wanted to invent things," Grebler said.

After high school, he enrolled in Carleton University's aerospace engineering program, expecting fascinating lectures about the inner workings of airplanes.

"I thought I was going to learn to design airplanes. The first class, it was 300 students, and it was just calculus. It was really difficult to keep myself motivated in school," he said.

Which is why Grebler turned to inventing. While at Carleton, the student heard about a grilled cheese sandwich with the image of the Virgin Mary on it. Someone had preserved the sandwich and sold it on eBay for around $200,000.

"I was talking with my brother ... we thought, what if someone could make their own Virgin Mary grilled cheese sandwich in the comfort of their own home," he said.

"We ended up getting a stamp made. The idea was to press it into grilled cheese sandwiches."

Grebler sold about seven sandwich makers on eBay. When he wasn't pressing holy images into grilled cheese sandwiches, Grebler was involved with his school's Hillel.

"I saw I wasn't going to become a hard core engineer, working through differential equations. That wasn't really my big drive. I saw I was much more interested in business. I felt like being involved in the Jewish Student Association gave me a lot of experience to do some management," he said.

Grebler enjoyed organizing events for the school's Jewish community.

"It was a really amazing experience. It taught me it was up to you to step up and do something if you wanted something to happen. You couldn't rely on just waiting for other people to do things," he said.

It was through his work at Hillel that he met his wife, who he eventually followed to Toronto. Now working as an engineer, Grebler hopes Ubi, which is still in the protocol phase, will do more than make phone calls and check emails.

The computer can also help those with impaired vision or hearing since it includes an indicator light that changes based on events like getting an email or receiving stock market information.

"[The Jewish community] has always given me a sense of purpose. Everything that I work on has to have some type of benefit for others. It can't just be solely a venture for profit," he said.

"That's something I really gained from my involvement in the Jewish Student Association and from my upbringing."

Canadian Jewry 5773

We're fortunate to live in Canada in 5772. While not all of us have comfortable lives, many of our streets are lined with monster homes, and our shul parking lots are filled with luxury cars.

There's little controversy in Canadian Jewry 5772, and we're free to walk the streets with a kippah on our head, tzitzit blowing in the wind and a tallit draped over our shoulders. Occasionally, a car full of young hooligans will yell out, "Hey Jew! I dropped a penny," but it's surprising, because few of us born and raised in Canada have been exposed to real Jew-hatred. The Conservatives are in power, and all is good, because they're so deeply committed to our State of Israel. What could be bad?

In Jewish Canada 5772, we take great pride in saying it's near impossible to live on less than $150,000 a year, because real estate tax is $7,500, day-school tuition for the three kids is $40,000 and Pesach meat and kosher-for-Passover products can run the average Jew $3,000. On top of that comes camp and the annual family trip.

In Jewish Canada 5772, tzedakah flows from our pockets for nice and important things such as cleaning the Anshei Minsk Synagogue, Baycrest and the Canadian Cancer Society's annual daffodil month. While we're all aware of the Tomchai

Urban Writer

Avrum Rosensweig

Shabbos tzedakah fund to feed the needy on Shabbat and Jewish Family & Child's supplementary assistance program to top up the monthly take of those in poverty, we're no longer asked to increase our giving to assist Jews being held hostage, as they were by such dictators as Romania's Nicolae Ceausescu and Syria's Hafez Assad.

The overwhelming majority of the world's 13.4 million Jews live safely in the west and Israel. Operation Exodus, the campaign in the 1990s to rescue Jews from the former Soviet Union, is a thing of the past.

Canada's 375,000 Jews, the world's fourth-largest Jewish community, are a comfy bunch, and thank God we are. For some reason, we were blessed to live in a country, on a continent, where there's no talk of excommunicating Jews, as there was throughout history in dozens of lands. The laws are mostly fair, and we're allowed to own land and develop it, practise our religion freely and run for government at every level. In Jewish Canada 5772, we're vigilant about the antisemitism and yell loudly when comments even smelling of antisemitism are spoken or written. Jews no longer hide in fear as we once did. Certainly, Israel and its tremendous strength and success play a role in our calm lifestyle.

In 5773, let's consider, however, that good times are meant to prepare us for challenging times. How should Diaspora Jewry prepare for a potential Israeli attack on Iran? How would we save the 25,000 Jews living there? Are we prepared for a real estate market crash and diminishing tzedakah receipts? What will be with the growing poverty on Bathurst Street? Are we thinking of accommodating more and diverse Jewish voices regarding our future, so that we're not just a monolithic column of thinking, and so that we remember the refugees coming to our shores and are compassionate toward them? Are we living up to our commitment, around the world, to "Never Again?"

Five thousand, seven hundred and seventy three years after Creation, will the Canadian Jewish community show greater international leadership in the area of multifaceted and creative and compassionate humanitarian innovation? We can. We're now free.

Shanah Tovah. Have a sweet holiday. Thank God we're free.

Lessons I learned from my father

I'm always filled with thoughts of my father, Israel Asper, around the High Holidays because the last time I saw him alive was in my home, breaking the fast after Yom Kippur, in October 2003. There is no question that he is the individual who has most inspired me as a role model.

Although he seemed like a traditional, conservative man, he insisted that I obtain an education and have a career so that I would always be able to look after myself. He felt it was very important for women to be independent, even though he also believed strongly in the importance of family and motherhood.

He strongly encouraged me to study law because he felt that it was one of the most useful educations anyone could have and could open doors to many different career opportunities. He was right.

Dad also provided me with an unbelievable opportunity to work with him at Canwest Global Communications Corp. and The Asper Foundation. Spending 14 years side-by-side with him provided me with an incredible education about the importance of hard work, tenacity and remaining focused on the goal you are trying to achieve.

He had many axioms that he would continually quote to my brothers and me and that still resonate to this day. My favourite is: "Never do a little deal." And it certainly has inspired me to dream big with the Canadian Museum for Human Rights and reach for the stars, not for the usual Canadian mediocrity. He always pointed out that little deals take as much work as big deals, with nowhere near the reward.

Working with my father, I learned that anything challenging is going to take time and an inconceivable amount of energy, and you have to really be committed to achieving your objectives and seeing a project through, no matter how high the mountain. If I hadn't watched him overcome adversity after adversity, and experienced his frustration and disappointment as he built the Canwest Global media network, I would never have learned how to cope with the challenges and disappointments of creating the Canadian Museum for Human Rights.

I will be forever grateful for dad's love of Israel and his fearless, passionate Zionist heart. His creation of The Asper Foundation and its national Holocaust and Human Rights Education Program sprang from his belief that young people need to learn not to be indifferent to human rights abuses and must learn the lessons of the Holocaust, that of personal responsibility for all humankind. He wasn't just passionate about Israel. He was passionate about the idea of justice for all, especially for the most marginalized in society.

I know I was lucky to have had the opportunity to work with and learn from my father.

For this New Year, I will be counting my blessings to have had a father who cared deeply for his family, for his community and for Israel. I hope to lead by example with my own family in the years to come.

Philanthropist Gail Asper is a trustee of the Canadian Museum for Human Rights in Winnipeg and president of the Asper Foundation.

Be open to new experiences, new ideas

When I was about 11 or 12 years old, attending elementary school in my hometown of Makow (Maków Mazowiecki) in Poland before the war, I had a remarkable teacher, Mr. Izaak Wesolek, who was and continued to be a role model throughout my life. He not only taught me about history, he guided my growth as an individual and helped shape my intellectual development.

Even at that young age, I became a voracious reader, and Mr. Wesolek made the time to sit down with me and discuss with great attention and wisdom the books I was reading. Before I was fortunate enough to come under Mr. Wesolek's mentorship, I was, like most boys my age, much more interested in sports than in school. I was always active, and loved skating, bike riding and swimming, as well as playing soccer. By encouraging me to read and think and really understand what I was reading, Mr. Wesolek made me a much better student.

I first came to appreciate Mr. Wesolek's influence the year that I went away to attend secondary school in Warsaw. It was my first time away from home, and although I was homesick, I used the experience to build upon the things that I had learned from my elementary school teacher – I immersed myself in reading and developed the language to discuss ideas such as universal justice and human rights. These are ideas that have stayed with me and formed the basis of my worldview. I can say without hesitation that Mr. Wesolek helped me gain a better understanding of society and the world, and develop the goals that I wanted to achieve in life.

This wonderful teacher also encouraged me in other ways. I have always been a very visual person, and even going back, in my memory, to elementary school I was always interested in the arts. I even wrote poetry! I loved to draw and was fascinated by the design and fashion magazines in my father's factory. My father was an accomplished tailor, and the international design and fashion magazines arrived at our house from France and other parts of Europe. Mr. Wesolek fostered my love of drawing and encouraged me to draw Polish and Jewish heroes.

When the Germans invaded Poland in the fall of 1939, I had to flee at the age of 17. I was able to spend some months in Białystok with my brothers, Ephraim and Pinchas, but I soon found myself completely alone. This was a terrible time for me, on the run, separated from my family, always only one step ahead of the Germans. At the same time, as I travelled through the Soviet Union to Tashkent, Teheran and Baghdad, and finally to kibbutz Maoz Chaim in pre-state Israel, one of the things that allowed me to sustain myself was my fascination with new experiences, new countries, new cultures and new architecture. This is the legacy I received at such a young age from Mr. Wesolek, my elementary school teacher and mentor in Makow, the man who instilled in me the importance of being open to new experiences, new ideas and new challenges, and sowed the seeds for my deeply held belief in lifelong learning.

Educator's grandmother believed in her as a teacher

A few years ago, I was fortunate to have participated in a workshop with Rabbi David Lapin, the founder of Lapin International. We were working on leadership development.

One of the first things that we were asked to do was to write down our personal core values. We were then asked to reflect on how these values impact our attitude toward our workplace.

My first "core" was family. I thought of my spouse, my children, my parents, my in-laws and siblings and even my friends. But how did this affect my work? After much discussion, I realized that I see my Toronto Heschel School staff as "family" and that the interpersonal relations were very important to me. The notion of teamwork and interdisciplinary work stems from this as well.

Where did this come from? I was certainly raised in a strong cohesive family. Who influenced my parents? Who also influenced me?

My thoughts immediately went to my maternal grandmother, Sura Liba Goldman Solnik.

Sura Liba came to Canada from Mizrich, Poland, as an orphan when she was in her mid-teens. She was sent to work on a farm in Georgetown, Ont. My grandfather soon came calling as he was looking for a wife to help him raise his two little girls. They were married and went on to raise a family of five daughters.

My grandmother taught me a great deal about leadership, particularly about relating to people and honouring people, no matter their position in society. My grandmother taught me to look out for the poor and to support the downtrodden. My bubbie was not a rich woman from a monetary perspective, but somehow she always had enough to make sure that the rabbi down the street, who was barely eking out a living, always had enough for a Shabbat meal. At the same time, she also had some coins for anyone or any organization that was trying, in her mind, to better the world. One of my earliest memories is going with my grandmother to a concert where the folksinger Pete Seeger was performing. It was in a recreation hall at her beloved Camp Naivelt, which is Yiddish for "New World."

'She helped me stand up whenever I fell down'

This was the McCarthy era and Seeger had been banned from performing in the United States. Even though I was barely three years old, that experience stayed with me. My grandmother taught me that no matter one's age, no matter how much money one had, you must always be a contributing member of the community.

My bubbie was always teaching. She loved all of her children and grandchildren fiercely and would not tolerate a mean word to be said about or between any of us. Throughout my childhood, adolescence and young adulthood, not a word of lashon hara ever passed through my grandmother's lips.

My bubbie's teachings covered everything. I clearly remember a song I once sang for her. The lyrics began something like: "We'll build a world of our own, that no one else can share..." Boy, did I get a lecture! I quickly learned that one must always be very careful of what one says and that every word counts.

My grandmother taught me important lessons about learning. When I was a teenager, she asked me to teach her how to write her name. As a young orphan, she never had the opportunity to go to school, but here she was as an older adult, ready to learn. We worked together at her kitchen table until she was able to form some of the letters. I certainly was not skilled in this area, but her devotion and belief in me as her teacher was so affirming that I have carried, throughout my professional life, this feeling and belief that everyone can learn.

Sura Liba was not only a role model and an inspiration; she was also my cheerleader. She always encouraged me in my pursuits, wanted me to have the best education possible and she helped me stand up whenever I fell down. Sura Liba taught me how to live a life of values and ethics. Despite the many hardships that she encountered, my bubbie went through life with a smile. As a Jewish leader, educator and community member, I fully embrace her teachings.

Seventeen years ago, I sat down with a group of educators and we began imagining the Toronto Heschel School. Though my grandmother was no longer on this earth, she was definitely beside me as we began defining what our school would be like.

Sura Liba Goldman Solnik with baby Gail

We began imagining a school where a vibrant Judaism would embrace the diversity of the Jewish world.

We began imagining a school where the bricks and mortar would be a shelter and a window to the outside world.

We began imagining a school where children would be celebrated for their uniqueness, where the standards of education would be deepened and where students would graduate ready to take their place as engaged citizens in our democratic society.

Our school would be ethically based. We understood that unless our Torah values were embedded in school culture through curriculum and practice, these values would become mere slogans, a poster to be hung on a wall.

We start off every week with the mid-dah hashavuah, which is the ethical theme taken from the weekly Torah portion. It is posted for all to see, discussed and practised. My grandmother understood and taught me that unless you actively do something, then it won't be effective.

Sura Liba Goldman Solnik was a role model to me and an inspiration for my personal and professional life. She helped shape the person I am today.

I became a rabbi because of my father

Who is the individual who has most inspired you as a role model, helping you formulate and then achieve your aspirations?

For me, the answer is a slam dunk – my father, of blessed memory.

And now for the explanation. Under normal circumstances, children naturally look up to those who raise them and are likely to pattern their lives after them. As they get older, the veneration does not diminish, but the “following in the footsteps” scenario does not necessarily unfold.

Looking back and I am deeply grateful for this opportunity to reflect, I did not have clear aspirations to become a rabbi. My father was a rabbi, and I moved gradually from wanting to be a firefighter, to a policeman, to doctor or lawyer, with becoming a rabbi only a possibility.

As the years went by, circumstances prevented me from making a decision on this matter. It was made for me, by my father, but not in a conventional manner. My father never told me to become a rabbi. He never asked me to even consider becoming a rabbi. But I became a rabbi because of my father.

When I was in my early teens, my father suffered a near-fatal heart attack. He was relegated to bed rest for six months (that was the medical protocol then). The shul of which he was the rabbi could not afford to hire another rabbi, nor was there an appetite for another rabbi. So guess who was pressed into emergency service? His older son. That was me. At the age of 16, I was fumbling through sermons and classes, with guaranteed acceptance by a congregation who appreciated the limitations of a 16-year-old. No funerals or weddings, just the shul stuff.

And I grew to like it, to the extent that this became, without a conscious and deliberate decision, my career choice. In truth, I was practising without a licence, since I did not receive my rabbinical degree till a few years later. Even before I came to Ottawa in 1967, for my first and only rabbinic posting, I was “working” with my father. That was how it all began.

To this day, I consider my father to be the quintessential congregational rabbi. There are many great rabbis serving their communities, but my father stands out in so many ways. And what is so incredible is that he had little if any training for the challenges in the rabbinate. He was literally sent packing by his parents from Germany when the dark clouds loomed large on the horizon and went to England with only uncertainty for his future.

He married, two children – my sister and I – were born there and then we came to America. He applied for a prestigious pulpit in Bronx, N.Y., as an unknown with no track record as a rabbi. Against all odds, he was chosen. His life as a rabbi can best be described as a classic expression of dedication and devotion.

With my mother, of blessed memory, at his side, and fully engaged in congregational activities, my father became a leading rabbinic personality. He established a wide coterie of colleagues, among whom he was definately a leader and a peacemaker. And as uncompromisingly Orthodox as he was, so was he commensurately open and embracing of everyone, and non-judgmental and always welcoming. Parenthetically, he brought more Jews closer to their roots without deliberately seeking to do so; his personality was the magnet.

I am convinced that the reason why he suffered a heart attack in his early 40s was because he worked so hard. His was a 24/7 commitment. He did everything expected of a rabbi, plus. House calls for all sorts of situations – visiting the unwell at home and in hospital, pre-funeral and shivah visits, consultation for problems, etc. – all were done with unabating energy and full concentration. This was before the age of cellphones, so the “intruders” on civility were not around. But I somehow doubt it would have made a difference for my father. When he met with you, you had 100 per cent of him, nothing less.

There was an interesting carryover of this 100 per cent formula. My father did everything 100 per cent. It seems trivial, but whenever he took someone home from a meeting, he never dropped them off at the corner. He insisted on taking them to the door, even if it meant taking a detour. I try to follow this as a way of continually honouring his memory, aside from it being a great practice.

My father had infinite patience for people and situations, and no patience for those who took advantage of others. I well remember how he really laced into a funeral director who cut corners in the preparation for a funeral. There were no insults. My father never insulted anyone. But there were harsh words at high decibels, which came after an original calm, sensitive entreaty. When my father saw he was getting nowhere, he let loose. All this because he cared, and cared passionately. He made sure this practice at the funeral home was abandoned forever.

The passion came through in his speeches. He would start off high and then go higher. I tried to get him to change his style after the heart attack, arguing that it would be better to make his erudite presentations more calmly, and only occasionally going full blast. He agreed in theory, but in practice, his passion came through from the beginning to the end of the speeches. He could not be what he was not.

Because of who he was, and the stellar reputation that he had, my father was in great demand, for the usual rabbi items – weddings, funerals, stone-settings (incorrectly referred to as unveilings), etc. After he “retired,” the families that he served so loyally always wanted more of him. In Israel, he would run to the bar mitzvah celebrations of the children and grandchildren of his former members. His natural goodness filtered through the generations.

Speaking of retirement, my parents retired to Israel when they were still in their energetic prime, in their mid-60s. In Israel, my mother continued her open house policy, with hardly a day going by with no visitors. And my father, having no official job, gave 12 classes a week, triple what would be considered a normal load, and all gratis. Interspersed were regular trips to the airport to greet children, grandchildren, and others who would come to visit, or to stay for a year or more. The standing joke in the family related to the definition of an impossible task – trying to convince my father not to go to the airport.

My father never ran after money. He refused to charge a fee for anything. I remember phone calls, of which I heard only one side, wherein the caller tried to extract a fee, but my father never yielded.

'He was about giving, not receiving'

He was not about money. He was about giving, not receiving. After his passing, we found many uncashed cheques in his files.

When the congregation that hired him fell upon bad times, as the neighbourhood change precipitated a wholesale exodus from what was once a thriving Jewish community, my father had ample opportunity to push for a sale of the shul, and then deservedly aggrandize for himself a significant portion of the proceeds. Many rabbis in similar positions did just that.

But that was not my father. At great pains, and with an enormous awaiting challenge, he convinced the officers of the shul to perpetuate the shul in a better location. The challenges were mind-boggling. There was no money yet from a potential sale; there was no place for a new shul; there was no infrastructure within the shul to shepherd this move, and there was hardly any free time for my father to oversee this, as he was going at a hectic, non-stop clip.

But there was no stopping him. A location was found, and the transition from one shul to another was on the way. At the beginning, my father would alternate between the old shul and the new shul. The walk on Shabbat was quite demanding, but he was unfazed. It was somewhere in this critical time that he suffered the heart attack. After his recovery, he slowly inched back into full gear, and I became the unofficial rabbi of the other shul – "other" being the shul that my father was not at for the particular Shabbat. Eventually, the old shul was sold to a community social agency, and the move was complete.

The shul still exists today, just barely, in another neighbourhood that once had a thriving Jewish presence.

Rabbi Hayyim Yaakov Bulka

My father put principle over convenience his entire life, but perhaps no more so, in quantity of hours and quality of commitment, than with the "move."

It is uncanny that as I progressed through my life as a rabbi, I was able to translate the profound messages of my father's rabbinic life into reality. I automatically followed his "no fee for service" motto. The only exception was for conversion, for which I deliberately charged a fee, to cover the expenses of running a rabbinic court. Any excess went to charity. And like my father, I was involved in setting up the community eruv and in addressing kashrut matters.

Then, there came a time (early 1970s) when the shul in Ottawa, Machzikei Hadas, was faced with an existential challenge – move and survive, or stay and wither away. I had promised the congregation that if they decided to move, I would stay on. They so decided, and I stayed. But I had a much easier time. I had a full complement of people who were dedicated to the move, and who looked after every nuance of it, including finding a site, developing the building plan, getting it built and raising the funds to pay for it. All the while, the image of my father was a gentle, warm and guiding presence for me.

Dedicated rabbis like my father pay a heavy price. Family life often has to take a back seat to emergencies that invariably arise. Vacations were few and far between, and often a scheduled trip had to be cancelled. Later on, I found myself doing the exact same thing and gained a better appreciation of the sacrifices my father made. He never thought of them as sacrifices, and could never have managed through them without the unwavering support and encouragement of my mother.

Truly amazing it is that this couple, united by the common circumstance of escape from the tentacles of evil and, with little experience to guide them, became exemplars of what being a rabbinic family is all about.

My father was, is, and always will be the measuring rod for what it means to be a rabbi. I have no illusions about reaching up to his level of excellence. But at the same time it would be irresponsible not to have that as my goal, impossible as it may be to reach.

Rabbi Reuven P. Bulka has been the spiritual leader of Congregation Machzikei Hadas in Ottawa for 45 years.

SMARTSET

Following in the footsteps of my aunt

I can't say I led a more sheltered life than most Jewish girls growing up in the 1950s and '60s in Baltimore, but I certainly felt that I did. By the time I was 12, I thought my dad was far too strict, hopelessly old fashioned and overly protective. My mom did what she could to soften him a bit – I was, after all, finally allowed to wear pantyhose rather than ankle socks at my bat mitzvah – but there was no getting around Dad's notions of appropriate behaviour.

The future for me was well defined, at least in his mind. I was to do well in school, behave like a lady and never "talk back." Curfews and dress codes were strictly enforced. As the skirts got shorter and the boys got older, the domestic arguments grew louder and more frequent. As a good girl, I would win honours in school, but remain under my father's wing until I was married. Of course, I would marry a Jewish boy from a nice family who would provide well for me and our children.

My parents were both only children born to immigrant families in the Great Depression. Maybe that says it all. Both suffered some degree of antisemitism in their high school years and beyond and felt safest living in Pikesville, the Golden Ghetto of Baltimore, where even the public schools were 99 per cent Jewish.

Mom was raised in Richmond, Va., where Jewish kids were unwelcome at their high school proms. My Richmond grandparents owned and ran a series of grocery stores in African American neighbourhoods. Papa was only 15 when he left Lithuania on his own to come to America, where his uncle owned a furniture business. Pop worked for Uncle Jake in Philadelphia, but before long, he landed in Richmond, where he also had relatives. There he fell madly in love with my grandmother, before she even knew his name. She was on a stage in a line-up of girls at a bathing beauty contest at the beach. Pop asked his friend Morris, "Who is she?"

"You'll never get a date with her," Morris responded. "She's my cousin, Etta Specter, born in America with a high school degree. Her parents would never let her date a greenhorn like you."

He was right. They eloped within the year, to be married by a rabbi shortly thereafter.

My mom moved to Baltimore in 1948 to go to nursing school. On the first Rosh Hashanah she met my dad in synagogue. He was a handsome young law student. His parents were also eastern European immigrants who owned and ran a liquor store. My dad worked in the store in the days and went to law school at night. Quickly becoming serious, they agreed to wait until my dad finished school before getting married. Both families were delighted, but their wait was much shorter than planned.

They married in early 1950 and when I was born in October, my birth certificate recorded my father's occupation as "law student." My Mom was only 19 when I was born (her Mom was 39), and my Dad was only 22. Three years later, my sister was born, and with the help of both sets of parents, we moved into a small house in the suburbs and then to a bigger house in Pikesville. Mom was a Leave it to Beaver housewife, like all of her friends, and dad was a lawyer downtown.

We spent every school holiday in Richmond and most Jewish holidays with my dad's parents in Baltimore. Often we celebrated together with all four grandparents. The only time I spent away from the family was a few weeks each August at a Jewish summer camp. We travelled often by car or train from Baltimore to Richmond, but that was all the travelling I ever did.

Sherry Cooper

But I had dreams to live a much larger life, to live like my Mom's Aunt Jeane. Aunt Jeane, born just after the turn of the century, was my Richmond grandmother's sister, the eldest daughter of nine children. After she left high school, Aunt Jeane went to work as a secretary for the owner and president of a finance and insurance company in Richmond. When he moved company headquarters to New York City, Aunt Jeane and three of her friends left Richmond for the Big Apple. Barely 20 years old, Aunt Jeane left home unmarried and unchaperoned for the wilds of Wall Street.

Over time, she became one of the senior leaders of the business, which had become a mortgage banking company with offices in several states.

The impact of gifts

She married my Uncle Jack, who also worked in the business, but she was the powerhouse, carrying on when the men went off to World War II. By the early '50s, business was booming, as new young families needed mortgages. Aunt Jeane and Uncle Jack made it big, but the hours were long and business travel a must.

The family would talk of Aunt Jeane with great pride, and I would see her occasionally when our visits to Richmond overlapped, but her meaningful impact on me came from the gifts she would send as she travelled around the world. She sent dolls dressed in beautiful costumes from countries in Europe and the Far East. For my 11th birthday Halloween party, I wore a kimono and fan she had sent from Japan. I dreamed of going to all the places she did and played games with my sister where she was the secretary and I was the boss with an office.

When I was 11, I was a junior bridesmaid at my cousin Gloria's wedding. Aunt Jeane, never having had children of her own, was very close to Gloria, and she orchestrated and paid for the wedding – the most elegant, over-the-top wedding any of us had ever seen. My dress was fit for a princess in pale pink taffeta and organza with a full skirt trimmed in lace. I carried a bouquet of pink roses with flowers in my hair and floated down the aisle on the arm of my cousin Neil, the junior groomsman. To me, Aunt Jeane was magical.

She and Uncle Jack lived in a penthouse on 5th Avenue and had a full-time cook and chauffeur. She enlarged the mortgage banking office in Richmond, and several of my other aunts, uncles and cousins worked for her. She had homes in Atlantic Beach and Richmond, travelled many times on the Queen Elizabeth cruise line and wore couture clothes and fabulous jewels. They were very active in New York philanthropy and were avid supporters of Israel and Israeli causes. Aunt Jeane died not long after I moved to Canada in 1983, but her spirit lives on in me.

Afterword: I did fulfil my Dad's wishes for me. I am a wife and mother and soon to be a grandmother. But I also have a fabulous job in finance and travel the world. My son and his family now live in New York City. And, when my sister's daughters were little girls, I sent them dolls in beautiful costumes from all over the world.

Elie Wiesel: the conscience of humanity

Elie Wiesel has come to embody "the people's conscience," not only for Jews but for humanity as a whole. Indeed, when Wiesel received the Nobel Peace Prize in 1986, the choice was greeted with international acclaim. Truly, it is difficult to imagine any citizen in the world who has so commanded the respect and attention of political leaders and the people themselves. One suspects that if the Nobel committee had awarded Wiesel the Nobel Prize for Literature, the acclaim would have been no less.

Wiesel writes, as the title of one of his books puts it, as a "soul on fire" – he has inspired not only the world of literature and the humanities, but has ignited the struggle for peace and human rights worldwide. His eloquence is all the more remarkable, because, as he puts it, the Holocaust is beyond vocabulary. In matters such as these, language mocks reality. Yet, the man who argues that Auschwitz and Birkenau are beyond communication and comprehension has not only conveyed the particularity of the Holocaust – the uniqueness of this radical evil – but also transmitted the universality of the message: that never again must this horror be allowed to be repeated; that never again will we be indifferent to hate; that never again will we be silent in the face of evil.

The most compelling – and apt – characterization of Wiesel is that of the "conscience of humanity." Simply put, his life's work has been underpinned by the biblical injunction "justice justice shall you pursue," an injunction – as our sages tell us – that is equal to all the other commandments combined. This, as my father used to say, is that which should be taught unto one's children, and Wiesel has been teacher, witness, messenger – and conscience. For me – as for so many others he has touched – he has been an inspiration.

Indeed, Elie Wiesel as the conscience of humanity has inspired and impacted people worldwide, not abstractly but individually, in their daily lives. As a law professor, for example, I was profoundly influenced by Wiesel's writings, suffused as they were with the pursuit of justice. As a human rights lawyer, I was inspired by his passion and commitment to tikkun olam, the betterment of the human condition. And as counsel to prisoners of conscience, we found our most powerful ally in Wiesel's voice and testimony.

As a member of Parliament – and particularly as justice minister – I found myself in the position to seek to act upon many of the lessons imparted to us by Wiesel, such inspiration finding expression in initiatives such as the development of Canada's National Justice Initiative Against Racism and Hate, or the passage of the War Crimes and Crimes Against Humanity Act, or establishing a National Day of Reflection on the Prevention of Genocide.

Some 25 years ago, McGill University's faculty of law chose Wiesel to inaugurate its Raoul Wallenberg Lectureship in Human Rights. As the university's then principal – and current governor general – David Johnston, said in his introduction: "One suspects that if Raoul Wallenberg were here – and with the efforts of Wiesel, he might yet be with us – he would choose Wiesel to deliver this inaugural lecture, for that which has been said of Wallenberg can also be said of Wiesel. Surely it is the reverence for life, for humanity, for human rights, for peace that comes to mind when we speak of Wiesel, our speaker."

This lecture – titled "Witness" – was as moving in its eloquence as it was profound in its message. It stands out for me personally, but it was also a transformative event for all who attended and serves as but one example of how an encounter with Wiesel can be a life-changing experience of the highest moral character. Indeed, former Canadian Supreme Court justice Claire L'Heureux-Dubé was inspired to write a poem; human rights advocates from all over the world sat transfixed; students still recall how the experience changed their lives, and even the clergy – Christians, Jews, and Muslims – made it the subject of interfaith dialogue. In essence, such an encounter put conscience, in the person of Wiesel, at the centre of the lives of all those who were present and imparted some of the more important lessons I have learned from Wiesel, lessons that may serve us all.

The first is the importance of zachor – remembrance: remembering things in Jewish history too terrible to be believed but not too terrible to have happened; of the Holocaust, as Wiesel has put it so well, as “a war against the Jews in which not all victims were Jews, but all Jews were victims.” – of the right to memory as a fundamental human right. Indeed, Wiesel has singularly patented this right, observed in, for example, the ritual reading of victims’ names at Holocaust Remembrance gatherings all over the world, gatherings themselves inspired by Wiesel.

The second lesson is the responsibility to combat – prevent – incitement to hate and genocide, recalling for us how the Holocaust was made possible by state-sanctioned cultures of hate, and reminds us of the need to hold President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad’s Iran accountable in this regard.

Third is the danger of silence – of the consequences of indifference and inaction – where “indifference.” as truth to power. As Wiesel noted in regard to the complicity of the Nuremberg elites during the Holocaust: “Cold-blooded murder and culture did not exclude each other. If the Holocaust proved anything, it is that a person can both love poems and kill children.” We must guard against such abuses of power and seek to have Wiesel studied in schools of law, medicine, engineering, theology – each of whose elites was complicit in the Holocaust – and not just in classes of literature.

Finally, Wiesel has been warning about the resurgence of antisemitism, saying that he feels a sense of “urgency” – even “emergency” – and that he has not “felt this way since 1945”; of the lessons here too of the Holocaust – that while Jews died at Auschwitz because of antisemitism, antisemitism did not die, and as we have learned only too well, while it begins with Jews, it doesn’t end with Jews.

In short, in each of these areas, Elie Wiesel has been a melitz yosher – an advocate for justice. We continue to be inspired by him not only in the New Year, but in the years to come, and may we commit ourselves to his legacy, to pursue a more just society and a better world for us all.

Irwin Cotler is Liberal MP for Mount Royal and a former federal justice minister.

May we commit ourselves to pursue a more just society and a better world for us all

Wiesel puts it, “always means coming down on the side of the victimizer, never on the side of the victim. Indifference in the face of evil is acquiescence with evil itself.”

Wiesel’s fourth lesson, simply put, is that of the danger of a culture of impunity and the related responsibility to bring war criminals to justice – and the inherent importance of survivors’ testimony. Indeed, we are witness to a shocking culture of impunity in our day, when few of the perpetrators of humanity’s greatest crimes are brought to justice, thereby encouraging even more criminality and atrocity.

Fifth, Wiesel has warned of the trahison des clercs – the betrayal of the elites – of the responsibility to speak

My mother – my inspiration

The person who most inspired me was my mother, who died four years ago at age 95. Had my mother been born when I was – in 1938 – she would have been the first person in our family to achieve material and secular success. But my mother was born in 1913 and graduated high school just before the Great Depression of 1929 began.

She was the first person in the history of her family ever to attend college, having been a spectacularly successful high school student. But she was forced to drop out of City College (a free school in New York) because of the Depression and her family's need for her to earn money.

Alan Dershowitz

She spent the rest of her life as a book-keeper and was never able to complete her formal education and go on to do the great things of which she was capable.

But she never stopped thinking. She was blessed with a perfect memory. Well into her 90s, she could still recite poems and full paragraphs from books that she had read as a child. She had even memorized the entire Latin mass that a public elementary teacher had taught her Jewish students in an effort to Americanize them.

Although she lived and died as a strictly Orthodox Jew, she constantly challenged religious authority. No rabbi was smart enough for her. No religious rule escaped criticism. She didn't suffer fools easily, and there were many fools in her community.

Because she was denied so many opportunities as a child, she lived her aspirations through her children. Her goal for my brother and me was for us to be highly successful lawyers while remaining strictly observant Jews, though questioning all of the premises on which our religious observance rested ("Atheists, Shmatheists...I don't care, as long as you go to shul, keep kosher and marry a Jew.")

It didn't turn out exactly as she planned. It never does. She was disappointed that I was not religious enough for her. But for me it turned out okay and for that, I will always be grateful to my mother, Claire Dershowitz.

Alan Dershowitz is a professor at Harvard Law School.

Sharing stories

My grandmother – my bubbe – Rose Diamond (née Foreman) died on Feb. 2, 1985, at the age of 89. Six months before her death, Rose warned me, in her poetic fashion, that when she could no longer dwell on the fine detail of a turning leaf, anticipate with pleasure the coming of spring or tune her ear to a bird song, she would exit this world. Always true to her word, she did.

Hers was a memorable funeral, one that she had orchestrated with great attention to detail. The pallbearers were women as well as men. There was a female rabbi. She was staunch (her favourite compliment), yet sentimental, as were the songs that she chose for her commemoration – September Song by Kurt Weill and Autumn Leaves by Jacques Prevert and Johnny Mercer.

Most importantly, she insisted that we celebrate her values by sharing her stories. And now I share these with you. The stories derive from an oral history interview that I undertook with her in 1978.

Together we are strong

My grandmother was an active participant in the social and political movements that shaped the early 20th century as were many American Jews of her era. She inspired my commitment to understanding history; the combined power of individual leadership and collective action and the need to balance hope and realism.

"My parents arrived in the United States in 1880 [New York]. They were extremely young, not yet 18. My mother had to buy her own sewing machine in the garment industry, and she carried it every day to work. She lost three children; she had miscarriages on account of the fact of working and carrying this heavy load daily. And she worked sometimes to three o'clock in the morning. Within a year, the garment trades formed a union. And my father, who was a very quiet, religious man, joined the union. He got eight dollars a week.

"You never slid down the ladder. If we knew a neighbour was going out on strike, my parents saw to it that they would not suffer and it was the other way around; we would be taken care of.

Sara Diamond

'She was leader of the demonstration'

My mother would do her baking on Thursday and she would count how many people would need bread... We were very pro-union, extremely so, even though we had the religion. I noticed the changes – what unions meant for the people as a whole at that time. In quantity you can get ahead, not in aloneness."

Rose became an effective orator and organizer. My father, Jerome Diamond, shares his memory of events that transpired in Union Square during the onset of the Great Depression.

"Communists fought on day-to-day issues. Like my mother. She was a neighbourhood organizer amongst her housewives. They had arbitrarily raised the price of milk four whole cents and four cents was a terrible blow. So in no time at all, she has organized housewives and they marched down to City Hall where police received them sitting on their horses and battled them. They were in a demonstration with about 18 to 20,000 people. My friend and I were leaning against the railing watching. Well, I was very proud because I saw my mother being an activist here. There was a mounted policeman on his horse trying to push them away. And suddenly he was off his horse, and my mother was down on the ground. She didn't have any major injuries, but she certainly gained notoriety as the leader of the demonstration... It really changed my mind – it turned my head around."

Rose Diamond

Speak up against inequality

Through my grandmother's and parents' circles, I was privileged to grow up in a vibrantly multicultural community, one that celebrated a rich mix of race and creed, shaping my lifelong commitment to equality. In addition, my grandmother did not believe in turning a blind eye to racism.

"I was going to the A&P and I saw these black boys cleaning the shelves and the white boys putting things on in their white coats. I walked up to the manager and I says – at the time I had a big mouth – 'Something shocks me.' He says, 'Have I done anything wrong?' I says, 'Why are all these black boys doing all the dirty work and these white boys all dressed up in their uniforms and putting the cans on?' He looks at me and he says, 'I never heard anything like this before.' I says, 'You better hear it because I am going to advertise the fact.'

"I went to 106th Street, where there was a black women's movement there and I explained the situation. I had our Jewish women all marching with me and before you know it, within a year we saw those black boys in white coats doing the shelves."

Women and men should be equals

My grandmother was a feminist from a very early age – a trait I inherited.

"When I was eight years, suddenly I saw this hullabaloo. The fifth child was a boy and of course it was a bris. I saw my brother having this fancy party and I said to my father, 'Why should this baby have all this fuss? I saw two little girls being born, and there was no fuss for those little girls.'"

In the 1910s, at the age of 19, she became a close ally and then friend of the anarchist and birth-control activist Emma Goldman, whom she met in the park where Rose had taken her two young children. My grandmother soon joined her in this campaign. Rose espoused liberal views on the importance of women's sexual pleasure and what became "gay rights" until her death.

In a multitude of ways, my grandmother taught me the great power and generosity of love. My grandmother and grandfather, Martin, were deeply, mutually and passionately in love. They first met when at the age of 11, she taught his sister, Anna, to play the piano and then again when she was 14, when their romance was kindled. "This was the young man who I had cherished since I was 11 years old." The couple dated and then the parents "arranged" the marriage, as was the custom of the day. Martin was irreplaceable – Rose remained a widow after his death although she was barely 60.

My grandmother shared her love. As a young woman, she pitched in as the eldest child and helped her mother and father raise her seven brothers and sisters while caring for her own growing family of three. In later life she became a one-woman flying squad, arriving whenever there was a need for a mature view or tenderness. She moved to Toronto when I was 14. My mother had died when I was 10, and I was sorely in need of a female role model. She was unobtrusive – simply offering me a place to rest my head, a meal, welcoming my friends and I with a hug and – sharing stories, stories that allowed me to piece together my family history and created a grounding of ethical values.

Give us bread but give us roses

Martin and Rose made beautiful music together, as did their children – my father the violinist, Aunt Anne, the pianist, and Aunt Sylvia, the jazz singer and organizer for the American Federation of Musicians. My grandfather was a lyricist, with published music and occasional royalties, and Rose composed the music for the songs. Rose spoke fluent Yiddish and enjoyed the Yiddish theatre, as well as the Metropolitan Opera, visits to art galleries and uptown to Harlem were essential parts of her family life.

Without question my commitment to the arts was, in part, instigated by Rose.

The early 21st century offers different challenges to those of my grandmother's era. However, her fundamentally Jewish values – a commitment to equality, respect for collective action, generosity, loyalty, passion and valuation of culture retain their relevance today.

Dry Bones

My father's books inspired me

Gordie Howe could have been my role model but just never inspired me enough to learn how to skate. Some teachers, politicians, actors, writers and a lot of regular people I have come into contact with throughout my life who caught my eye and who clearly have the ability to inspire, could have been my role model. People who have faced enormous obstacles in their lives didn't escape my admiration. Overcoming adversity is something that should and often does inspire us all.

I am attracted to those who show a commitment to their communities, who are selfless, who like to help others, who are compassionate, fearless. But in terms of forming a vision for my own future, I cannot say that some stand out more than the rest – except two people – my father and my mother.

My dad was born in Poland. He arrived in Canada in 1928 at the age of 13, knowing no English. He learned English by listening to the radio and went right into Grade 8. He quickly rose to the top of his class where he remained throughout his high school career. He learned the language so quickly and so well that by the end of his first year in Canada, he spoke without an accent, became an eloquent writer and went on to win several regional oratorical contests.

Joseph Greenspan graduated from the University of Toronto with a BA in law in 1939 and then went on to law school. At the same time, he was articling in the offices of J.J. Glass, one of Toronto's first Jewish lawyers, where his future wife, Emma Mercel, born in Toronto of Russian Jewish immigrants, was working as a legal secretary.

His dream of a legal career was cut short when his father, Morris, had a heart attack. Joe returned to Niagara Falls to take over the family scrap business.

Emma and Joe married and had three children. I was born in 1944, my brother, Brian, was born in 1947 and my sister, Rosann, was born in 1950.

Ian Brown, a genuinely insightful feature writer with the Globe and Mail, recently wrote an obituary of his father. Brown wrote, "Your father stands apart, watching, the one who shows you how life works, who provides a context, your instructor, your guide, your teacher, your friend, and finally your companion." His father, also a scrap metal broker, died at the age of 98. My father died suddenly on March 31, 1957, at the age of 42, exactly one month after my bar mitzvah. I remember the despair that settled over our house when he died.

Edward Greenspan

One month after that, I was sitting in our family den taking a careful look at his library for the first time. I vividly recall removing Irving Stone's biography Clarence Darrow for the Defence, sitting in my father's favourite chair, leafing through the book and noticing that some passages were underlined by my dad. I can see myself turning to page 1 and starting to read the book. I was up most of the night. By the next evening, I had read the last page. When I closed the book, and as I suspected soon after opening it, I knew what I wanted to do when I grew up.

The book was about an enormous figure in American history, as well as a giant in the courtroom. Clarence Darrow was a legendary criminal lawyer who fought relentlessly against capital punishment. He was a man filled with courage, kindness, charity, an infinite pity for the outcast and the weak. He had a warm sympathetic, merciful and understanding heart. Through him I could know my father.

Standing next to Darrow on the shelf was Quentin Reynolds' book, Courtroom. That book was about Samuel Liebowitz, the great American criminal lawyer who defended his first client in 1919.

Liebowitz was four years old when his family moved from Romania to the Lower East Side of New York in 1897. Reynolds wrote that the "early environment Liebowitz grew up in, the environment in which he flourished, gave him a sympathy for the underprivileged and the poor." I read that book. My father had underlined portions of this book as well.

'I wish I knew more about my father'

Although Darrow and Liebowitz came from very different places, they agreed on so much. More importantly, these two books, with their underlinings, told me that my father's role models were these men – men of action, who defended the indefensible, protected the underdogs, questioned received "truths," instinctively opposed any exercise of government power and would never sacrifice their own independence of thought. He obviously admired their fierce individualism. They were debunkers and demystifiers who were always skeptical of every element of the case against their clients. Their lives were dedicated to their clients, human rights, freedom of expression and liberty. The stakes were always high: their clients were at risk of losing their liberty or their lives. Liebowitz and Darrow had a burning zeal for justice and a sense of dedication to the administration of justice.

As I put the second book back on my father's library shelf, I knew without a doubt that I would be a criminal lawyer. The case for the defence was proven beyond a reasonable doubt.

Emma Greenspan

It's easy for me to believe that my father actually believed in the ideas and lives of Darrow and Liebowitz. I wish I knew more about him, but these books were read by him and underlined by him. To me, it meant that my dad had a thoroughly independent way of looking at things and a deep sense of justice and fairness. It's the way I think. It was in his genes and it's in mine.

My mother became a public school secretary and raised her three children alone. She was self-sacrificing, filled with kindness, love and had an unfailing generosity of spirit and always put other people's needs before her own. Like my father, she had an unwavering devotion to family and friends. There was no other way for her. Her infinite kindness, sympathy for others, and strong moral sense has done much to shape my life. She was always there for us. She was an inspiration and clearly my role model.

My father died when I was very young, and my remembrance of him is not very clear. He died 54 years ago, when I was 13. My memory of him is blurred and faded. Obviously, he could not have been my role model in the same sense of guiding my steps along the way as Ian Brown's father did. But he was my role model in so many other ways. Because I missed him so much, I wanted to be just like him. And when, through his library, I understood what he stood for and what his philosophy of life was about, it shaped and accorded comfortably with the way I think. I've always had little respect for the opinion of the crowd. My instinct has always been to question the majority view. I am thoroughly independent in the way I look at things. And so, although I didn't have him in my life, his influence has clearly been so profound on me that he occupies an equal place with my mother, as my role models.

Mama is a writer

I hold Mama's hand. It seems smaller and thinner than the last time I held it. Two bluish purple veins protrude – one somewhat more than the other. They flow from the same source – split and then joined together like the Dneiper and other winding rivers in the Ukrainian countryside of my childhood.

Whether it was relaxing near the river or waiting in Soviet food lines (and we stood in many), Mama would not give up. Her eyes on me, she would often say: "Straighten your back. lift your voice when you read and speak. Tell me about the colour of the sky, the greenness of the foliage, you'll improve your vocabulary. You will not need to dig into your pockets to find a word."

She would tutor me regularly after school, and when we were out of time at home, she would continue by turning those endless lineups into places of learning. Even now, when I study with my son as he is learning to read, I hear her voice echoing in mine:

"Straighten your back. lift your voice when you read and speak. Tell me about the colour of the sky, the greenness of the foliage."

I come from a line of strong and beautiful women. When Papa married Mama, she resembled his mother in beauty, strong character and temper. Storms would erupt between mother-in-law and daughter-in-law, and Papa withstood these rough patches stoically, attending to both parties with careful reverence to both sides. Nevertheless, to me and my sister, Babushka Ginda was made of honey.

However with aging and our transition to North America, Babushka Ginda began to rely more and more on her daughter-in-law. "Have you called your mother?" Mama would ask Papa, reminding him of his responsibility. When my grandmother could no longer bend and look after some of her personal needs, Mama would arrive at her apartment with provisions: soup, cutlets, something baked, and a nail clipper. My mother would bend over and reach for Babushka's foot and then I would hear that distinct click, click, click. Babushka, now resembling a child, would sit on the chair with her arms folded, trusting. To this day, when it comes to loyalty and family welfare, no one compares to my mother.

Mama is a writer. She puts down words using her beautiful round letters. She records her favourite recipes in two large notebooks meant for my sister and me. When Mama sets her table, her tablecloth cannot be seen. Each dish competes for attention in taste, arrangement and variety. I see her tired figure approaching her table holding another dish.

"Mama," I say, "this is more than enough."

"Maybe for Americans it is, but not if you are one of us. Your table should be full." She gives me that familiar look. "This is the way." And I know she is right.

I inhale dill, cinnamon, garlic in her kitchen. The scent sets a trail from her stove to her living room in Indianapolis, and all the way back to Ukraine, to those summers on the lush banks of the Desna.

Over the years, mentors of all kinds dazzled me with their insights and intellect. Wonderful rabbis modelled great works for me, and elegant women shared their hats with me, but nothing would have happened if it was not for my mother. No – she did not inspire me to become a rabbi. As a matter of fact, she was in shock when I first told her of my intention to go to rabbinical school: "You remember where we come from? You know what our roots back in Kiev were like?" I knew where we came from, but I did it anyway.

Now we both agree it was a wonderful choice. But my mother was the beginning of it all. If it was not for her fierce love of education and sustenance and caring for others, I would not be where I am today. Even after more than 10 years on the pulpit, when I am about to give my sermon at Rosh Hashanah services, I hear my mother's voice: "Straighten your back, lift your voice when you read and speak, use the treasury of words you have learned to collect." And only then do I feel prepared to deliver a message to a large audience, as if she had been preparing for this moment since I was very young.

Sometimes we do not know that someone is a mentor until decades after they made their first impressions on us. Twenty years ago, I might have chosen a different figure to write about, but today Mama is the most obvious choice for me. The "rivers" flowing in her veins are now visible in my own hands. "Lidor vador." They flow from the same source – split and then joined together like the Dneiper and other winding rivers in the Ukrainian countryside of my childhood. With time and maturity, I have been able to more fully appreciate the role my mother has played in my personal formation and my professional growth. I only wish that I might be half the mentor to my son as my mother is to me.

Kafka helped me to dream fiercely

I believe I look sort of like Franz Kafka. That's probably why I first felt him to be an inspiration.

Sure, there were his stories full of mystery and complexity, the subtle musicality of his language – the reasons why he's considered one of the pre-eminent literary figures of the 20th century. But it was his boyish, slender face, often marked in photographs by the shadow of a wry smile (or a wryness somehow conveyed in the absence of a smile) that really stirred me when I was a teenager and first became aware of him. Look at that, I thought as I pored over Googled photos of the weird bard of Prague. It's me.

This basically shallow and half-witted identification found ample support as I learned more about Kafka. His feelings of alienation from, yet also attraction to, the dominant culture that surrounded him? Sure – I knew what that was like. His lousy job with an insurance company, a job that kept him from the work he felt fulfilled his deepest potentials? I could see myself winding up with a job like that; the prospect terrified me. His troubled love life, a series of evasions and long-distance longings? Tell me about it! The closeness I felt to him, emblemized in the image of his face – its Jewishness, its vulnerability, its restless intelligence – wasn't exactly comfortable. The example of Kafka the man was more cautionary than inspirational.

And yet that was only half the story, of course: there was also Kafka the author to consider. My sympathy to his work was less immediate than my attraction (entirely platonic, let it be said) to his face. I read The Metamorphosis, even acted in a theatrical version of it, and found it tedious, heavy-handed. But soon I discovered stories like A Country Doctor, surprising and mysterious and full of profundities I couldn't quite articulate but felt deeply. Or The Trial, a puzzle-box of a novel, loaded with oblique revelation about the situation of the individual in a world he doesn't understand, a society that may not have his best interests at heart. I discovered, as a rough common denominator between various English translations, what I took to be Kafka's tone, somehow both breathless and terse, dry and fraught – in itself a striking statement of what it meant to the author to be in the world. And with these discoveries, I came to feel that my pseudo-doppelgänger had much to teach me.

Kafka taught me that creative work can have a transformative effect on a life weighed down by petty oppressions. His fictions, full of symbolism and dream-like comic flights, gave me permission to pursue my own creative work along whatever corridors of the imagination it led me down, no matter how serpentine. They showed me that the result of such pursuit could be poetry, mysterious light.

Without the example of Kafka, I'm not sure I would've felt confident straying as far from "the ordinary" as I've sometimes ventured in my own work as a playwright and fiction writer. I'm not sure I would've allowed myself to dream so fiercely and so personally, and to do so in public. To have that kind of courage and invention without Kafka's example, you might say that I would've had to be Kafka.

And I'm not – no matter how much I look like him. But I am a young Jewish writer with a healthy set of neuroses comparable to those that troubled the Czech-German master, and so, for myself, I admire wasted his.

Then again, camaraderie with the dead is easy. In person, K. and I would probably get on each other's nerves.

Father liked to inspire laughter

I think my father, Jackie Kelman, would have snorted with derision at the idea of inspiring anyone as a role model. This was a man who routinely paraded in a wrap-around towel on his way to the shower, performing a dance meant to evoke Egyptian hieroglyphics and singing A Pretty Girl Is Like a Melody. At five foot two, he was not an imposing figure. He had many fine qualities, but dignity was not one of them.

Although he was very free with career advice ("Why don't you write some Dickens or Hemingway, something that will sell?"), none of it was serious. He knew I could never become the Pope. What he liked to inspire was laughter, and he was very good at it. I wish I could be more like him.

That is only partly because of his major and most obvious virtues. He was, for instance, brave. At 17, he enlisted in the army by lying about his age. A year later, he turned down the offer of a promotion to corporal if he continued to work at the old York Street Armoury. He wanted to ship overseas, and he did, working with an RAF casualty evacuation unit in spite of his lifelong queasiness at the sight of blood. He always claimed he got his bar of medals for good attendance.

He was also instinctively tolerant. Long before gay pride became a public issue, he dismissed discussion of a cousin's lesbian affair with the judgment, "Everyone has to love someone." As a travel agent, his second career, he made friends around the world with everyone from government ministers to a Japanese singing quintet, the Happi Coats, to a Jamaican bartender who took us upcountry to meet his family.

I recognized his role in my own life early in my career in radio. I was alone in the office, trimming an interview for the CBC show Sunday Morning. The subject had a stutter, which I was removing. This was before the computer era, so it was a finicky physical process. As the clock ticked, I realized that all my work would shave perhaps 30 seconds from a five-minute interview, although it would also make it much easier for the listener. And then I thought of my father. In his first career, he was a furrier, and I remember him sneering at a colleague who hadn't bothered to cut away the tangles of unnecessary threads to make the finished coat lighter, not even in a jacket for his own wife. I started to laugh: I was cutting away the extra thread. He had taught me pride in my craft.

I owe him my career

I also owe him my career itself. Every morning, as my mother hauled out the vacuum cleaner or made the beds, my father left for a magic place – downtown. He returned each night with tales of triumph, tragedy, scandal and disaster, often gleaned over lunch at the Toledo or the Lite Bite. So I knew early that I didn't want to stay home and vacuum. I wanted to be out in the world, making a living and shmoozing with the guys. And that's where I managed to land.

But Jackie also loved coming home at night. He was a loyal and devoted father to me and my two sisters, but we were not the main attraction. He doted on my mother, even in her final years as she slipped into the fog of Alzheimer's disease. As my mother lost ground, he learned how to clean and do laundry. He became positively competitive about his cooking. Squeamish as he was, he resisted help in caring for her until it became physically impossible for him. When she was moved to a nursing home, he visited her every day until her death.

From my father, I learned that you do not marry another person. You marry another family. Our home was a constant social club and drop-in centre for two extended families, hers and his. I know that at times, he craved more of his wife's undivided attention, but he never tried to restrict her boundless hospitality. That's something else I learned from him: you can't change other people.

I do not mean to suggest that he was a saint. He could have been an Olympic contender in the category of holding grudges. In his speech at my wedding, most of it devoted to a hymn of praise to my mother, he reproached me for inadequate vindictiveness, noting that I sometimes forgave people after as little as 20 years.

Like many men, he had a horror of emotional scenes. When he received his diagnosis of terminal cancer two years ago, he gave me my orders: "Stiff upper lip, kid. I don't want you to let anyone in here to cry over me." And I didn't, even though I had to keep his last surviving sister from visiting him, and even though I longed to cry over him myself.

Now that he's gone, we are free to cry. This summer, a gentleman asked me for directions to the visitation centre at the Mount Pleasant Cemetery. As we strolled there together, I learned that he had worked for El Al. I said that he must have known my father. At the words "Jackie Kelman," his eyes filled with tears. But he laughed through them as he placed his hand about two feet from the ground and said, "Jackie! He was short like this!" Then he raised his hand above his head and added, "But he had a mouth like this."

Freud says that jokes spring from veiled hostility. Remembering my father, I'm sure that's not the whole story. I think that his jokes were gifts, a way of sharing his own joy in life. When I think of my family, I hear laughter. Thanks to my father, I know that laughter can be a form of pure love.

Ground up

I have a good dad. I'm lucky. I know. Not everyone has a good dad. Last week, I went to the hospital with him for a fairly routine test, and the doctors told us that he was going to die. He has an advanced stage of cancer at the base of his tongue. The kind you don't recover from. Cancer had visited my father four years earlier. The doctors were optimistic then, and he really did beat it.

The doctors said there were several options this time. We could do nothing and my father would die in a few weeks. He could undergo chemotherapy, and if it worked, it would give him another few months. They could give him radiation treatment, but the chances were that this would hurt more than it would help. Or they could operate and remove his tongue and his larynx. It was a complicated surgery that would take more than 10 hours, and, considering my father's advanced age, the doctors didn't think it was a viable option.

But my dad liked the idea. "At my age, I don't need a tongue anymore, just eyes in my head and a heart that beats," he told the young oncologist. "The worst that can happen is that instead of telling you how pretty you are, I'll write it down."

The doctor blushed. "It's not just the speech, it's the trauma of the operation," she said. "It's the suffering and the rehabilitation if you survive it. We're talking here about an enormous blow to your quality of life."

"I love life," my dad gave her his obstinate smile. "If the quality is good, then great. If not, then not. I'm not picky."

In the taxi on our way back from the hospital my dad held my hand as if I were five years old again and we were about to cross a busy street. He was talking excitedly about the various treatment options, like an entrepreneur discussing new business opportunities. My dad is a businessman. Not a tycoon in a three-piece suit, just a regular guy who likes to buy and sell, and, if he can't buy or sell, he's ready to lease or rent. For him, business is a way to meet people, to communicate, to get a little action going. Just let him buy a pack of cigarettes at some kiosk, and within 10 minutes, he's talking to the guy behind the counter about a possible partnership.

"We're really in an ideal situation here," he said, totally seriously, as he stroked my hand. "I love making decisions when things are at rock bottom. And the situation is such druck now that I can only come out ahead: With the chemo, I'll die in no time at all; with the radiation, I'll get gangrene of the jaw; and everyone's sure I won't survive the operation because I'm 84. You know how many plots of land I bought like that? When the owner doesn't want to sell, and I don't have a penny in my pocket?"

"I know," I said. And I really do.

When I was seven, we moved. Our old apartment had been on the same street, and we'd all loved it, but my dad insisted that we move to a larger place. During World War II, my dad, his parents and some other people hid in a hole in the ground in a Polish town for almost 600 days. The hole was so small that they couldn't stand or lie down in it, only sit. When the Russians liberated the area, they had to carry my father and my grandparents out, because they couldn't move on their own. Their muscles had atrophied. That time he spent in the hole had made him sensitive about privacy. The fact that my brother, sister, and I were growing up in the same room drove him crazy. He wanted us to move to an apartment where we would all have our own rooms. We kids actually liked sharing a bedroom, but when my dad makes up his mind, there's no changing it.

He wanted us to have our own rooms

One Saturday a few weeks before we were supposed to leave our old apartment, which he'd already sold, my dad took us to see our new place. We all showered and put on our nicest clothes, even though we knew we weren't going to see anyone there. But still, it isn't every day that you move to a new apartment.

Though the building was finished, no one lived in it yet. After dad made sure we were all in the elevator, he pressed the button for the fifth floor. That building was one of the only ones in the neighbourhood that had an elevator, and the short ride itself thrilled us. Dad opened the reinforced steel door to the new apartment and began to show us the rooms. First the kids' rooms, then the master bedroom and finally the living room and the huge balcony. The view was amazing and all of us, especially my dad, were enchanted by the magical palace that would be our new home.

"Have you ever seen such a view?" he hugged my mom and pointed to the green hill visible from the living room window.

All of us, especially my dad, were enchanted by the magical palace that would be our new home

"No," my mom replied unenthusiastically.

"Then why the sour look?" my dad asked.

"Because there's no floor," my mom whispered and looked down at the dirt and exposed metal pipes under our feet. Only then did I look down and see, along with my brother and sister, what my mother saw. I mean, we'd all seen earlier that there was no floor, but somehow, with all my dad's excitement and enthusiasm, we hadn't paid much attention to that fact. My dad looked down now too.

"Sorry," he said. "There was no money left."

"After we move, I'll have to wash the floor," my mom said in her most ordinary voice. "I know how to wash tiles, not sand."

"You're right," my dad said and tried to hug her.

"The fact that I'm right won't help me clean the house," she said.

"OK, OK," my dad said. "If you stop talking about it and give me a minute's quiet, I'll think of something. You know that, right?" My mother nodded unconvincingly. The elevator ride down was less happy.

When we moved into the new apartment a few weeks later, the floors were completely covered in ceramic tiles, a different colour in each room. In the socialist Israel of the early 1970s, there was only one kind of tile – the colour of sesame – and the coloured floors in our apartment – reds, blacks, and browns – was different from anything we'd ever seen.

"You see?" my dad kissed my mother on the forehead proudly. "I told you I'd think of something."

Only a month later did we discover exactly what he'd thought of. I was alone at home taking a shower that day when a grey-haired man wearing a white button-down shirt came into the bathroom with a young couple.

"These are our Volcano Red tiles. Direct from Italy," he said, pointing to the floor. The woman was the first to notice me, naked and soaped up, staring at them. The three of them quickly apologized and left the bathroom.

That evening at dinner, when I told everyone what had happened, my dad revealed his secret. Since he hadn't had the money to pay for floor tiles, he'd made a deal with the ceramics company: They would give us the tiles for free, and my dad would let them use our place as a model apartment.

The taxi had already reached my parents' building, and when we got out, my dad was still holding my hand.

"This is exactly how I like to make decisions, when there's nothing to lose and everything to gain," he repeated.

When we opened the apartment door, we were greeted by a pleasant, familiar smell, hundreds of coloured floor tiles and a single powerful hope. Who knows? Maybe this time, too, life and my father will surprise us with another unexpected deal.

(II) In my father's footsteps

It was the night I was supposed to fly from Israel to Los Angeles to kick off my book promotion tour, and I didn't want to go.

My father had died only four weeks earlier, and this trip meant that I would miss the unveiling of his headstone. But my mother had insisted. "Your father would want you to do it."

And that was a very persuasive argument. My dad really would have wanted me to take that trip. When he first took sick, I had cancelled all my travel plans, and even though he realized how important it was to both of us to be together during those difficult days, the cancellations had still bothered him.

Now I was thinking about him and the book tour while I was giving my son Lev his bath. On the one hand, I thought, the last thing I wanted now was to get on a plane. On the other, maybe it would be good for me to be busy, to think about other things for a while. Lev sensed that my mind was somewhere else, and when I took him out of the tub and started towelling him off, he saw it as a golden opportunity for a little last-minute roughhouse before his dad went away.

He yelled, "Surprise attack!" and gave my stomach a friendly head butt. My stomach actually took it well, but Lev slipped on the wet floor and began to fall backward, his head threatening to land on the rim of our old bathtub. Moving instinctively, I managed to place my hand on the rim of the tub in time to cushion the blow.

Lev came out of that violent adventure unscathed, and so did I, except for a small cut on the back of my left hand. Since our ancient bathtub had some brown rust spots on the rim, I had to go to a nearby clinic for a tetanus shot. I managed to get it done quickly so that I could make it back home for Lev's bedtime. Lev, who was already lying in bed in his pajamas, was upset. "They gave you an injection?" he asked. I nodded.

"And it hurt?"

"A little," I said.

"It's not fair," Lev shouted. "It's just not fair! I was the one carrying on. I should've gotten the scratch and the injection, not you. Why did you even put your hand there?"

I told Lev that I did it to protect him. "I know that," he said, "but why, why did you want to protect me?"

"Because I love you," I said, "because you're my son. Because a father always has to protect his son."

"But why?" Lev persisted. "Why does a father have to protect his son?"

I thought for a moment before answering. "Look," I said as I stroked his cheek, "the world we live in can sometimes be very tough. And it's only fair that everyone who's born into it should have at least one person who'll be there to protect him."

"What about you?" Lev asked. "Who'll protect you now that Grandfather's dead?"

I didn't cry in front of Lev. But later that night, on the plane to Los Angeles, I did.

The guy at the airlines counter at Ben-Gurion Airport had suggested that I take my small suitcase onto the plane, but I didn't feel like shleppeing it with me, so I checked it. After we landed and I waited in vain at the luggage carousel, I realized that I should've listened to him. There wasn't much in the suitcase: underwear, socks, a few ironed, neatly folded shirts for my readings, and a pair of my father's shoes. The truth is that my original plan was to bring a picture of him with me on the tour, but somehow, for no logical reason, a minute before I went downstairs to the cab, I shoved a pair of shoes that he'd forgotten at my place a few months ago into the suitcase instead. Now those shoes were probably circling around on some carousel in a different airport.

It took the airlines a week to return my suitcase, a week during which I'd participated in many events, given lots of interviews and slept very little. My jet lag provided a great excuse, even though I must admit that even in Israel, before I left, I hadn't been sleeping very well.

I decided to celebrate the emotional reunion between me and my luggage with a long, hot shower. I opened my suitcase, and the first things I saw were my father's shoes, lying on a pile of ironed shirts. I took them out and put them on the desk. I picked out an undershirt and pair of briefs and went into the bathroom. I came out 10 minutes later to a flood: The entire floor of my room was covered with water. A rare problem with the pipes, the moustached hotel maintenance guy would tell me later in a heavy Polish accent. Everything that was in my suitcase, which I'd left on the floor, was soaking wet. It was a good thing I'd tossed my jeans on the bed and hung my underwear on the towel rack.

The car that was coming to take me to the event was due in a few minutes, just enough time to dry a pair of socks with the hairdryer and discover how useless that was because my shoes were sitting on the bottom of the murky pool my room had become. The driver called me on my cellphone. He'd just arrived and had no good place to wait, so he wanted to know how long it would take me to come down. I glanced at my father's shoes resting on the desk, dry. They looked very comfortable. I put them on and tied the laces. They fit perfectly.

Three great leaders whose lessons live on

"From all my teachers I grew wise," (Psalms 119:99). The more I think about it, the more I realize how fortunate I have been to be inspired and strengthened by many role models whom I could look up to throughout my life.

I believe I should begin by expressing my gratitude and praise to the Almighty, my ultimate guide and teacher, for having bestowed upon me the desire and will to emulate leaders I have admired and observed over the years, bringing me tremendous joy and a sense of fulfilment.

I can connect the dots of my life back to my own parents, Max and Elli Podolski, whose strong Jewish values and traditions provided me with an abiding love and pride in everything Jewish. I can elaborate on my good fortune in marrying into the Koschitzky family with their strong sense of community and Zionist spirit. Never do I take for granted this double blessing that provided the support and solid foundation from which I could build my own identity, forging a path of Jewish leadership.

Throughout my Jewish journey, spanning three decades, I seized every opportunity to learn from others in many walks of Jewish life. However, there are three individuals in particular to whom I feel indebted for enabling me to assume varied roles of leadership and responsibility.

Julia Koschitzky

adage, "a picture is worth a thousand words." They are captured deep in discussion, likely contemplating a critical issue in Jewish life. I believe these three great leaders shared the commitment to the centrality of Israel in our lives – and this is what brought us all together.

I will forever be grateful to Phil Granovsky for introducing me to the work of Keren Hayesod (United Israel Appeal), which is the official fundraising arm for Israel in Jewish communities outside of the United States. Phil dedicated his life to its noble work and chaired the organization for many years. He encouraged me to begin attending meetings in Israel three times a year, which I continue to do.

One of the finest examples of Phil's guidance was the decisive action he took to convince Canadian leaders to launch the United Israel Appeal Operation Exodus campaign in the early 1990s, when tens of thousands of Soviet Jews were streaming out of the USSR for Israel.

At a special meeting held at the airport in Montreal, having heard a list of 25 reasons claiming it was the wrong time to launch this campaign, Phil needed only one reason why it was the right time: the doors of Russia were opening, and this was a window of opportunity – it was now or never.

As always, his vision and determination prevailed and he became the principal author of a glorious chapter in our collective history in Canada, raising $100 million for the campaign, one of Israel's finest hours.

What I most admired about Phil was that he always took a stand. His response to community matters was clear, concise and direct. For years after his death, whenever a problem arose, my initial reaction was: "I'll call Phil and hear what he has to say."

I first met Rabbi Mendel Kaplan of South Africa at his inauguration ceremony in Jerusalem in the late 1980's, when he became the first non-American leader to assume the position of chair of the Jewish Agency for Israel. At that time, I was a novice Jewish leader who had come to observe how the agency functioned.

Mendel ended his inspiring address by saying that he accepted the responsibility for three reasons. The first was personal – his family and his history were steeped in Lithuanian Jewish traditions, which had been transplanted to South Africa, where the Kaplan name has become synonymous with leadership and philanthropy. The second reason was the challenge, which he loved, and the third was his vision for the Jewish People. He spoke passionately about the privilege he felt in being able to share his good fortune with klal Yisrael.

'My eyes are cast towards a promising future'

As we know, first impressions are lasting ones, and to this day, I still quote what Mendel had to say. He used the word "privilege" to describe his feelings about communal responsibility and obligations. This resonated with me, and eventually evolved into the title of my own book, It's Been My Privilege. One does not come across people like Mendel every day, and his sudden death three years ago has left a gaping void that is difficult to fill.

Max Fisher was a great American Jewish leader from Detroit with a prophetic vision, whom I deeply respected and loved. In his biography, The Quiet Diplomat, it is clear that the profound diplomatic role he played had an immeasurable impact on the relationship between Washington and Jerusalem.

As a young boy growing up in Salem, Ohio, he was one of a handful of Jews. He never had a Jewish education, and so it is surprising that the enterprise that most emotionally engaged Max later in life was Jewish education. My close working relationship with Max was forged through the work of the L.A. Pincus Fund for Jewish Education in the Diaspora, which he chaired for close to 25 years.

One of my greatest personal honours was when, in his advanced age, he asked me to serve as his deputy chair. During the few years prior to his death, I learned from a master Jewish statesman who understood the art of quiet diplomacy.

In 1997, I was asked to pay tribute to Max in Jerusalem on his 90th birthday. At this event, I quoted something I'd learned from him: "You are only a leader as long as you keep looking back to see if people are following you."

I asked Max, sitting in the front row, to turn around and take a look at the hundreds of his followers seated in the tent that night who'd been inspired by him.

Unfortunately, none of these great Jewish giants is physically with us today, but their deeds live on. I am grateful for this opportunity to once again recall their enormous contributions to Jewish life and the influence they have had on me. They have bestowed upon me precious gifts, which I will forever cherish. I feel truly blessed to be able to say they were my role models, my mentors and, above all, my dear and trusted friends. As I look to the future, I am in awe of the new role models emerging from the generations of my children and grandchildren. As much as I respect the past, my eyes are cast towards an even brighter and more promising future.

Strengthening connections to Israel through humour

When I tried to come up with the person about whom to write, I had a tough time. I made aliyah six years ago, the culmination of a 20-year-plus Jewish journey beginning with my time in the Zionist youth movement, Young Judaea.

No journey is the result of just one person. How to choose which Israeli scout had the biggest effect on me at summer camp – the first one to teach me how to make pita and sing silly Hebrew songs in fifth grade, or the gorgeous one I fell in love with in high school (that doesn't narrow it down much, they were all beautiful in uniform) Was my biggest role model my first tour guide during my teen tour in 1990? Or was it my sixth-grade creative writing teacher who helped me put pen to paper, sparking me to explore my artsy/imaginative side that I take such pride in today?

All of these figures, whether any of us knew it or not, helped in their own unique way to set me on the path that has gotten me to where I am today. But the person who may be most responsible for my current career and passion is friend and comedian Avi Liberman.

I met Avi more than 25 years ago in Young Judaea. We were both from Texas, and his younger brothers, Micha and Joe, became two of my closest friends. Whether or not I looked up to Avi as a role model, I definitely looked up to him as someone who had seemingly been around forever in Young Judaea, first as a madrich (counsellor), later as my staff supervisor at camp, and always as Micha and Joe's older brother.

When I was just starting university, Avi graduated from college and moved to Los Angeles to try his hand at stand-up comedy. Who had ever heard of such a thing? Certainly not me. Despite Jews' disproportionate success in the world of humour, "comedian" wasn't a career choice that had even crossed my mind as an option. I had at least consciously eliminated doctor, lawyer and NHL goalie from my list, but who grew up even knowing any stand-up comics?

Within just a few years, I watched Avi make appearances on Comedy Central and even network television, landing a major role in CBS's mid-'90s sitcom, Dave's World. Suddenly, I found myself scribbling down funny thoughts of my own on pieces of paper during class. Within a few months of graduating from the University of Texas in 1997, I was attending open mic nights at the Laff Stop in Houston, slowly finding the courage to step onstage myself.

I remember Avi coming back to Houston to visit family, attending one Monday night show to watch me perform. Afterward, we sat in Taco Bell, eating some late-night bean burritos as I picked his brain (we were young and cheap) with every question I could think of. What other brain did I even have access to who could help me? Avi helped me realize that this was something I could do, and for the last 15 years, his level of success has been a benchmark that I hoped to reach.

Over the past six years in Israel, I have purged my act of most of my old material, replacing Backstreet Boys jokes "Hello, 1999" with observations about El Al security, learning Hebrew, celebrating the chagim in Israel, and of course, reflections on the differences between Israelis and North Americans and how I have survived my klitah (absorption process) in Israel.

But being witty isn't enough to be a comedian and there's no academic degree that can teach you what it takes to be funny onstage and to work for yourself. Avi's guidance over the years helped me not only understand how to be a better performer, but also how to be an entrepreneur, working with communities across North America to bring the magic of Israel to as many smiling faces as possible.

I'm not sure if Avi imagined back then that he might someday be leading international comedy tours to Israel. (Twice a year, he brings top-level performers to Israel, with the proceeds going to tzedakah.) I can, however, tell you that there was no part of me that ever dreamed I would live in Israel and would myself be touring in North America, making people laugh at this magical country. I have performed for organizations including Hillel, the Jewish Federations of North America and Taglit-Birthright Israel, among others, while appearing on Israeli and even Bulgarian (yes, Bulgarian) television, doing my best to portray Israel in a positive light.

Aliyah, to build a new life in Israel, is one of the most rewarding things that a Jew could ever do. I believe that no oleh (immigrant) could ever look back on his or her life in Israel and say, "Yeah, I saw this coming."

When I think about the untraditional career I have found myself in, helping to strengthen people's connection to Israel through humour, I can't stress that feeling strongly enough. And I can thank Avi Liberman for both setting a positive example for me of how to be a proud Jewish comedian and teaching me the tools to help achieve my dreams.

Many factors forged my Jewish identity

Approaching Rosh Hashanah, an essay describing major influences in my life is a great opportunity to spend some time being self-centred – in a legitimate way.

It is difficult to choose one person who has influenced me beyond all others; rather, I'd like to focus on the various schools, movements and philosophical views that have actually directed my life.

When I was a teenager, right after World War II, we were all engulfed in the Zionist idea, convinced that the Jews needed their own state. The descriptions of the ghettos, concentration camps, the subsequent displaced persons' camps, followed by stories of the Aliyah Bet ships, and then the revolt of the Jewish fighting groups against the British made us all "soldiers in the Liberation Army of the Jewish People" (a quote I heard from Abba Hillel Silver in Madison Square Garden, just after Simchat Torah 1945, when I was 14).

My desire to help was channelled via the Hashomer Hadaai Religious Zionist movement (precursor to the modern B'nai Akiva youth movement). This was a unique organization in North America, modeled after the Hashomer Hatzair. We were independent, with our own youthful leadership, our own finances and offices, and self-directed in every way. The ideology encompassed Torah as a way of life, avodah (think of a dose of utopian socialism), kibbutz idealism and left-wing politics. We were Zionist and wanted an egalitarian and Jewish society for the new Jewish state. Formally, we were part of the Hapoel Hamizrachi movement, which established a strong religious kibbutz movement. This intense mix of Zionism and social justice as ideals has, I am happy to state, not left me.

At this time, I was attending the Talmudical Academy High School of Yeshiva College (now Yeshiva University) and in the evenings I enrolled, simultaneously, in the extension division of the Jewish Theological Seminary.

JTS, in particular, held my interest and after graduating high school and enrolling in City College I continued, in even greater measure, to study at JTS's Teacher's Institute. Faculty members such as Abraham Joshua Heschel, Mordechai Kaplan and Saul Lieberman became role models as well as classroom teachers. They showed me that one could be an observant Jew and at the same time deal critically with classical texts.

In the classroom, there was analytical scholarship, yet at the same time, on special Shabbat afternoons (such as Shabbat Hagadol and Shabbat Shuva), professors would attend lectures (drashot) given by Orthodox leaders. I saw a harmony between questioning of the texts and living with its traditions; between being meticulous followers of the observances and mitzvot, alongside piercing intellectual analysis. That combination of "Torat Emet" (Torah of truth) and "Torat Chaim" (living Torah) – as expounded later by Prof. David Weiss-Halivni – has remained with me all these years.

Finally, there was Chassidism, both as an historical movement and in its present form. As a teenager, after Martin Buber published his Tales of the Hasidim in English, I welcomed the opportunity to study this latest Jewish revolutionary movement, a revolution that came about mainly due to internal factors.

My father, who came from a strong chassidic home, shunned chassidic behaviour and customs, yet related sympathetically to "abstract Chassidut" – the community and solidarity of its members.

The early chassidic masters were role models to me for their piety in general and for their love of all types of Jews. I empathized with both of the trends that subsequently split the chassidic movement: the intellectual and the mystical. To this day I pray on Shabbat at a chassidic synagogue, where I see the recognizable remnants of an earlier original spirituality. While I can realistically see many aspects of religious conservatism in their behaviour, I can nevertheless deeply appreciate the beautiful aspects of community, of readiness to help out one another, of ahavat Yisrael and a genuine commitment to tradition.

Thus, there was no one individual that I would point to as my major influence. I am happy to have been exposed to multiple views and to groups that have helped me in my quest to live a modern Jewish religious life.

Aaron Nussbaum

To give of oneself freely

When I was a little girl, my happy life suddenly turned upside down when my beloved father suddenly passed away after a short illness. For reasons of her own, my mother decided I'd be better off in a Hebrew day school rather than public school. I wasn't so sure. I was good in English – a writer even back then – but the Hebrew and religious studies seemed irrelevant.

But then one day in Chumash class we began learning parshat Mishpatim, which says, "Ye shall not afflict any widow, or fatherless child. For if they cry at unto Me, I will surely hear their cry."

I, the fatherless child, was deeply touched by these words and in turn, by their author.

Thus began a lifelong love and attachment to Bible study. My friends were a bit amazed by this: I wasn't a rabbi's daughter, after all. But for my engagement present, they all chipped in and bought me a beautiful set of the Pentateuch with a commentary in English by Rabbi Samson Raphael Hirsch, which I treasure and use to this day.

I moved to the Land of Israel with my husband when I was 21 and still a newlywed. Neither of us had ever been to Israel.

even for a visit. We went because we took God's words to Abraham, "Leave your father's house and birthplace and go to the land where I will send you," personally. We didn't want to be like the spies who scouted out the land and only then decided whether to go.

In the years I was struggling to bring up my young family and to pursue my dream of writing, I was always seeking out ways of deepening my study of the Bible. Luckily, a neighbour, a fellow olah from America, began to hold a Bible study class in her home using the study sheets of Nechama Leibowitz.

While I had heard of the great Bible scholar, I had never seen her study sheets. They were a page or two long and contained information, commentary and questions on every chapter in the Bible. They were fascinating, leading us into wide-ranging discussions that made us question, explore and delve more deeply into every word.

Then someone told me that Nechama Leibowitz herself held classes in her home once a week. They asked me if I'd like to come. I was thrilled.

I found myself entering the hallway of an old Jerusalem stone building in back of the bus station. It had a steep, narrow staircase and no elevator. Nechama Leibowitz's modest apartment was on the top floor. I, in my 30s, could hardly catch my breath when I reached her door. She at that time was in her late 70s. Amazingly, she lived in that same apartment until her death in her early 90s.

Entering, I was flabbergasted. The apartment was tiny, given over almost entirely to her study sheets, which were kept in piles everywhere.

The story of the sheets themselves was a fascinating one. Nechama Leibowitz and her equally famous brother, Yeshayahu Leibowitz, were both brilliant and dedicated Bible scholars. After coming to Israel in 1930, she educated Torah teachers, and also found time to give lectures all over the country. She had a radio show in which she spoke about the Torah portion of the week. Once, she was giving a lecture to a group of women factory workers, and one of them asked her if she could write down some questions about the Torah portion for them to answer.

And so was born her lifelong project of gilyonot, study sheets, stencilled and mimeographed (later photocopied) sheets containing questions along with her own commentaries. She did it for free, and never charged for them, except what it cost her to make the copies.

Every week, she would receive by mail hundreds of answers to her questions, addressed simply to "Nechama – Jerusalem." She painstakingly read them all, making comments and corrections and sending them back.

I can't imagine how much time and effort she put into this! Once, she said to us during one of the lectures in her home that she'd been awoken at 2 a.m. by someone wanting to discuss one answer on a study sheet.

'I will never forget her words'

We all grimaced at the idiot who would do such a thing. "I asked him if he realized it was 2 a.m. and he said he did. But he worked very long hours and the only time he was able to study Torah was late at night." Nechama looked at us. "Isn't that wonderful?"

I will never forget her words. While she was a distinguished professor of Bible at Hebrew University for decades, Nechama Leibowitz's true passion was spreading the study of Torah to ordinary people in all walks of life. She did it selflessly, with no thought of gain except the joy of enriching and informing the lives of those who reached out to her.

Years later, huddled at home in a Jerusalem suffering from the horrors of the intifadah, I would read on the Internet the most amazing lies condemning Israel and her people for the violence, lies perpetrated by well-established and respected media outlets, including the New York Times, the Los Angeles Times, Reuters, Associated Press and, most especially, CNN.

Many times, I just wanted to scream. And then I thought of Nechama Leibowitz and how she had tirelessly offered truth and knowledge to all those who sought it from her. I decided to start a mailing list in which I too would send out the truth to all those interested in hearing it.

And so began my mailing list. I started with about 20 subscribers, who would then send my messages out to their mailing lists, and so on. In time, I had 10,000 subscribers who were dedicated to spreading the truth, sending my messages out to hundreds of thousands of their friends all over the world.

Then one day, during the terrible tsunami in Indonesia, I sent out a message questioning the puny contributions of Muslim nations to the disaster relief, particularly considering most of the tsunami's victims were Muslim. Twenty-four hours later, this same question, which had not been brought up before, was being publicly asked on Fox News, with the result that Saudi Arabia upped its donations.

I knew then that my messages were having an impact. Even though my husband sometimes complains that I'm married to my computer, I know that whatever the personal price, it's important to enrich the lives of others with truth and with knowledge, to give of yourself freely and generously. I learned this from my teacher, Nechama Leibowitz, may her name be forever blessed.

An unexpected gift from my Talmud teacher

A rather unexpected gift from an Orthodox (by contemporary terminology haredi) rabbi to his student would be a set of books by Viktor Frankl.

Yet, The Doctor and the Soul and other works by Frankl were given to me as gift and guide by my Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto high school Talmud teacher, Rabbi David Kalman Drebin, of blessed memory, some 40 years ago, as I began my university and then medical studies. While unusual, this kind of non-conformist approach that embraced a broad spectrum of paths to finding and abiding by true Jewish meaning was typical of Rabbi Drebin.

At that time, it was not yet commonplace for graduates of Jewish high schools to spend a year or more in yeshiva studies in Israel. Presciently, Rabbi Drebin set up a program for his students to continue studying after high school graduation, and called it the Moriah Institute of Toronto (MIT), initially based out of the always open and welcoming apartment of Rabbi Drebin and his wife, Rabbanit Millicent Drebin, may she merit a long and healthy life.

The unique privilege of learning from Rabbi Drebin has served as a cardinal influence guiding the lives of myself and my wife, Linda, and by extrapolation, our children and theirs, and also my students in medicine and scientific research to this day. How so?

Rabbi Drebin had already helped me understand and appreciate the greatness of my beloved parents and their generation of Holocaust survivors, whose deeds spoke of faith in God and man, and who plucked vitality out of unspeakable adversity. He also knew of my determination to pursue medical and scientific studies and to eventually live in Israel.

Rabbi Drebin appreciated that two of the more difficult challenges that the fragile soul of a person of faith might face when entering the world of science and medicine with this background would be the reconciliation of scientific evidence with religious belief, and the even more difficult challenge of seeing inexplicable tragedy befall the innocent and righteous, otherwise known as the challenge of theodicy.

Rabbi Drebin evidently worried about the souls of his students, and also knew that these two challenges would not be esoteric and theoretical, but rather practical day-to-day issues challenging the faith and soul of any thoughtful physician and scientist. He knew that I would need a lifelong set of tools to maintain and, more importantly, transmit faith and optimism in the face of these challenges. Thus, began the merging of rigorous Torah studies with secular and scientific wisdom, in the study sessions with Rabbi Drebin that I was privileged to experience.

The books by Frankl were but one tool in trying to build such an integrated approach to what Rabbi Drebin knew were questions beyond human resolution, but through which we are all enjoined to build meaningful lives, each of us in our own life pursuits, but under the auspices of a number of shared domains of partnering with the Almighty.

The first of these is love of fellow humans and identification with the Jewish People and homeland. Rabbi Drebin had himself spent an extended period of time studying in Israel, and his advice to me always took into account the eventuality of aliyah and the realization that the true fulfilment of Torah obligations can only be achieved in Israel.

The second is family – and my wife, Linda, and I never forget that Rabbi and Rebbetzin Drebin were the first to ecstatically welcome and invite us to their home as a newly engaged couple, and showed us by example how a loving family is the highest embodiment of selfless giving. The third is the pursuit of vocation and profession, as an inherent virtue in tikkun olam.

The fourth and most elusive is uncompromising pursuit of truth and integrity. This is where Rabbi Drebin taught that the tools of science were themselves a divine gift, and that only through the humility of knowing how little we understand could we begin to open the doors to deeper and more accurate insight. For a young man, tainted with the hubris of youth, this was more important than lessons in linear algebra or in human physiology.

A blessing worth defending

In the late 1990s, I sat down with the great American novelist Richard Ford. A man of coiled power, he has a deep, drawing voice that is still wet from the Louisiana shorelines of his birth. He lets his words out carefully, as if launching large warships into the ocean.

At the time, I was hosting a CBC weekly book show called Hot Type and just completing my first novel, so I was excited to talk with him. I'd interviewed dozens of authors, but, like many people in their 20s, was more confident than wise. I asked Ford a question about his new book – I can't recall the details of it – but it was clearly not a good question. As he listened to me, his blue eyes darkened as if there'd been an oil spill.

"That's the dumbest questions I've ever heard," he said in his drawl, and leaned in close to my face to make his point.

At that moment, I recalled a story about Ford's temper. Once, he was given a bad review for his novel, so he nailed the review to a tree, blasted it with a shotgun and mailed it back to the critic. I tried to wriggle free.

"You're getting defensive, Richard," I said.

It is an old interviewing technique. Turn the question back on the guest, make them sweat, not you. Deflecting is as important as attacking. But Ford was having none of it. He leaned in even closer, his nose practically touching mine.

"Ah am gettin' defensive," he said, launching his warship words even more slowly than usual. "That's because I have somethin' to defend. What about you?"

I sat silent. What did I have to defend? That question cut to the heart of my life. A life lived is, in a sense, about making life worth defending. The conversation with Ford petered out as I dealt with the blow he delivered. I still think of it all these years later. And even though we became friends of a sort after that, and he eventually wrote a flattering review of my novel, something I still cherish, I cherish his challenging words more: what do you have to defend?

When I was asked which person had the greatest influence on my life, I immediately thought of that moment with Ford. Not that he had the greatest impact on me by any means, but he forced me to think about who had shaped my life and what I was doing with that. What did I take from the people around me that I could now stand for and defend?

It's a hard question actually. What truly influences the direction our lives take? Sometimes it is a singular event that becomes a turning point – a chance moment in a random restaurant and you meet the person with whom you will spend the rest of your life. Maybe the birth of a child influences your entire life, or, on the darker side, a terrible accident that changes everything.

Legacy of example

The fifth and perhaps most important, as described in Frankl's life experiences, is the freedom to turn any situation, ranging from the seemingly mundane to the overwhelming and momentous, into a meaningful opportunity to choose the ethical and moral pathway. The freedom to choose is the Almighty's gift to us, and gives meaning and direction to our lives, in day-to-day decisions and even in the most horrible of situations. Rabbi Drebin taught that Torah study is meant to help prepare us for these choices. Science can teach us how an automobile runs, but does not give us the rules of the road for safe driving to a meaningful destination.

Rabbi Drebin was taken from us at a young age, but left behind a collective and personal legacy through his teaching, and the spoken deeds of personal example.

I have been blessed with many great and inspiring teachers, and have the privilege of being shown clues to the wonders of creation in the world of biological and medical sciences, and doing so in the sacred and promised homeland of the Jewish People. Therefore, along with others blessed in this way, I have an obligation to try to help students today of all religions, nationalities and backgrounds, as they find their pathways in a world in which religious faith attuned to the increasing complexity of contemporary life is ever more necessary.

'My parents stand as icons of honesty'

It is impossible to separate one influence from the next. People are a palimpsest (writing material used again after earlier writing has been erased) of influences, of connections, each tweaking our life, shifting our directions, each experience changing us in small ways. In a sense it's a mug's game to tease out the most influential person or event in our lives. As a husband, it is impossible not to acknowledge my wife as the most influential person in my life. We share so much, we are raising our two children. And there it is – the children. Aren't they the most influential part?

But if I have to really say who has shaped my life, it is, without a doubt, my parents. They stand as icons of honesty, teachers of the importance of hard work, curiosity, adventure and risk. They are stewards of my past, curators of my education; and they gave me that greatest gift of all – unconditional love, which is, of course, what I call home. Everything I hope to do in my life as a parent, husband and professional I model on what they did and still do. It is a legacy I try to defend every day.

I never for one moment forget how lucky I

In a sense it's a mug's game to tease out the most influential person or event in our lives am to have the two parents who raised me, protected me, set me free and then, without ever giving up their parental duties as my guides, also became my dearest friends. Another new year with my family, all in good health, all still diving headlong into the world, is indeed, a blessing. A blessing worth defending.

Inspiring appreciation for what my parents transmitted

The influence of my home was so profound that I have almost always resisted other "role models" or what are today known as "mentors."

Along the same lines, I have tried as a teacher to inspire appreciation for what was transmitted to me by my late parents, Leo and Masha Roskies – love for the Jewish People, its languages, culture, religion, and homeland, and a deep appreciation for the free country of which we are citizens. first Canada, and now for me also the United States.

Ruth Wisse
(Johnson Photography)

Children often list in their notebooks their name, street address, city, district, country and continent, working outward from the particular to the universal. I feel fortunate that my chain of identity resembles my mature hierarchy of values, with the highest being those closest to the source.

My family and I arrived in Montreal on Oct. 19, 1940. All but me were multilingual – my brother spoke Romanian, Yiddish and German; my parents spoke Russian, Polish, Yiddish and German. My mother also spoke French, my father and brother had studied English on our ocean crossing from Europe, and all of them knew a little Hebrew acquired in school.

Most of the world they left behind was destroyed during the war. Parents responded to this loss by making our home language vibrantly Yiddish, by trying to find a Jewish society most like the one they had known in Vilna, and by sending help to friends who had survived.

Our parents sent us to the Jewish People's School, where we were raised to love k'hal Yisrael – a concept of peoplehood that corresponded to the inclusive Jewishness of our home. Rather than choose between Yiddish or Hebrew, as other Jewish day schools did, ours taught Yiddish and Hebrew. We were also expected to know French and English. Rather than prioritize between Canada and Eretz Yisrael, our parents and teachers taught us to appreciate and serve (as much as possible) Canada and the Jewish state that we saw emerging within our lifetime.

Rather than speak against religion, our home and school celebrated and commemorated those festivals and holy days that meant the most to them. My father's beloved quotation from Psalms was "lo hameysim ye-halellu yo – the dead do not praise the Lord." Nor do any who go down in silence." Not for a moment did he forget his murdered father and sister: I understood him to mean that those fortunate to be among the living must

was destroyed
during the war*

make the best possible use of the opportunity. Parents did so by having two more children – Eva (Raby) and David.

The principal and teachers of our day school had the most profound influence on me before I understood was influence was. In Grade 7, I was summoned by the principal, Shloime Wiseman, to his office. My mother had called him to complain of something one of our teachers had said in class. How did she know about it? I had told her. Though I had not complained but merely reported, Mother often took offence when no offence was intended. Mr. Wiseman knew my mother's temper and probably understood that I was blameless.

Nonetheless, he told me that in the future if I had anything to report, I was to come to him, not my mother, and to take special care in how I spoke about my teachers. He thus relieved me of the guilt of having inadvertently gotten my teacher into trouble.

My brother was my model in all things

I was impressed that he would back his teacher against a prominent parent. He treated me as a fellow adult who would have to help him protect the school. That incident taught me how authority ought to be exercised. I imagined King Solomon in Shloime Wiseman's image. Like him, our teachers had learning and intelligence, strong personalities, and short tempers. In this, too, the school resembled my home.

Then there was Pripstein's Camp, where I spent summers from age five through early adolescence. Afraid of polio, parents wanted us out of the city, and they chose a camp, as they had chosen a school, that seemed most reliably familiar. The camp was then a modest place whose reputation for excellence derived entirely from its owners – Chaim and Feige Pripstein. The director, affectionately known by his staff as C.P., tried to encourage individuality of campers within the group, through mutual respect. Skills were important, to be sure – swimming, sports, arts and crafts, and especially drama: operettas were a highlight of the summer, with parents in attendance.

But more important was the skill of getting along with strange and sometimes erratic fellow campers. Mrs. Pripstein (whom Mother never mentioned without reminding us in the same breath that she was a rabbi's daughter) was in the kitchen long before dawn preparing the food that also did much to boost the camp's good name. Many of our counsellors in those early years became respected social workers, psychologists, and teachers (I think they would agree) in the spirit of the camp.

My brother, Benjamin, of blessed memory, was my model in all things. The pressures of our relocation fell most heavily on him. He was expected to be a model, not to look for one in others, and took on responsibilities beyond his years, including shepherding me.

He was president of his Protestant High School (there were, at the time, no Jewish ones). At Pripstein's, as counsellor, he blew the trumpet for reveille and taps, and I picture him always on shmira – on guard. With his BB gun, he shot mice – and later hunted wild geese.

At college, he edited the journal of the Intercollegiate Zionist Federation of America. He went to Israel to work on a kibbutz at the age when his grandchildren in Israel not long ago began their military service.

I owe my parents my life twice over for having brought me out of Europe. They and Ben, and those who raised me, remained my strongest examples of who I tried to become.

The man who saved 900 Jewish boys

Brad Rothschild
The Times of Israel

For decades, Jews around the world have sought out examples of non-Jews like Raoul Wallenberg, whose centennial birthday was observed in August, and Oskar Schindler, who defied the Nazis to prevent the murder of Jews. In Israel, the Righteous Among the Nations is Yad Vashem's highest honour, and over 23,000 people have been awarded this status since the program began in 1953.

The criteria established by Yad Vashem is straightforward: Jews can nominate individuals who provided substantial assistance to save Jews, provided that said assistance was not given with the expectation of financial gain. Honorees receive a medal, a certificate of honour and have their name engraved on the Wall of Honour in Yad Vashem's Garden of the Righteous. If the recipient is no longer alive, the awards are given to next-of-kin.

The Jewish World

In July, 67 years after the end of the Holocaust and more than 20 years since his death, Yad Vashem granted this honour to Antonin Kalina, a Czech Communist who saved over 900 boys in Buchenwald.

There is little known about Kalina. He was born in 1902 in the Czech town of Trebic and in adulthood became a Communist functionary. After the Nazis took over Czechoslovakia, he was imprisoned in 1939 in the Buchenwald concentration camp until 1945. After the war he seems to have lived an unexceptional life; he died in 1990. During his time in Buchenwald, however, Kalina distinguished himself as a true hero and rescuer of children.

In late 1944 through early 1945, as the Red Army pushed the Germans out of eastern Europe, the Nazis began liquidating their death camps, placing Jewish prisoners on brutal "death marches" toward the German hinterland. Countless thousands of Jews died on these brutal marches westward – some from the cold, others starved to death along the way, others were shot when they failed to keep up. Those who survived were put into concentration camps scattered throughout Germany. Buchenwald included.

Buchenwald, a camp established in 1937 to imprison criminals and political opponents of the Nazi regime, swelled to over 100,000 inmates in the final months of the war.

Included in this influx of Jewish prisoners was a large number of boys, many between the ages of 12 and 16. These boys had come from all over Europe and had already undergone unimaginable horrors: ghettoization, transports, brutalizations, privations, starvation and often the loss of their families. By the time they arrived in Buchenwald, they were already hardened veterans of the camps, having learned how to survive under the most inhumane conditions. Upon their arrival at Buchenwald, thanks to Kalina and his deputies, their situation improved dramatically.

Kalina had risen to a position of influence in the underground, which ran the day-to-day operations of the camp on behalf of the Nazi SS. Kalina and his fellow prisoners decided to place the youths in a special barrack, far away from the main part of Buchenwald, deep in the filthy quarantine area where the SS was loathe to go. This barrack, number 66 in the "little camp," became known as the "kinderblock," or children's block. Antonin Kalina was the block elder. In this capacity, he went to extraordinary lengths to ensure the survival of the boys he placed there.

Unlike the other prisoners in Buchenwald, the boys of block 66 did not have to leave their barrack for roll call. Instead of assembling with the rest of the camp twice a day no matter the conditions outside, the boys were counted inside. Also, unlike the other prisoners, the boys of 66 did not go to work. Remaining inside the bunk was a tremendous advantage for the boys and a factor that certainly helped keep many of them alive. Conditions within the block were also better than in other parts of the camp – the boys had access to blankets, and at times extra food rations.

Significantly, the block elders didn't beat the boys, something almost unheard of within the Nazi camp system. Let there be no misunderstanding: despite the relative advantages, this was still a concentration camp full of fear, disease, hunger and death. But Kalina did what he could to mitigate this reality for the boys of Kinderblock 66, often at great personal risk.

As the Allied forces closed in during the war's frantic final days in early April 1945, the Nazis decided to eradicate Buchenwald's Jews. The camp's commanders ordered all Jews to report for assembly; they were to be forced out on more death marches.

Kalina refused to comply with this order. He commanded the boys not to report to the assembly and changed the religion on their badges – the Jewish boys were now listed as Christians – so that when the SS came around looking for Jews, Kalina told them that block 66 had no more.

For years, Kalina's heroism was unrecognized

Thanks to Kalina's efforts, when the Allies liberated Buchenwald on April 11, 1945, over 900 Jewish boys survived. When they were freed, the boys lifted up Antonin Kalina and carried him on their shoulders.

After the war, Kalina returned to his home in Czechoslovakia and lived out the remainder of his life in obscurity. His boys began new lives in Israel, the United States, Australia and Europe; but they always remembered the Czech Communist who risked his life in order to save theirs. For years, however, Kalina's heroism went unrecognized, partially because Kalina, a humble man, never sought out publicity for his actions. Likewise, for years, many of the boys who he saved didn't talk about their experiences during the Holocaust.

Several years ago, some of the surviving boys, now around 80 years old, along with a historian from Michigan

State University, Kenneth Waltzer, initiated a process to have Kalina recognized as Righteous Among the Nations. The impetus for seeking recognition for Kalina was the filming of the documentary Kinderblock 66: Return to Buchenwald, which tells the story of four boys who go back for the 65th anniversary of their liberation from the camp. The film also tells the story of Kalina, and highlights his role in the rescue of the children in the camp. Two of the film's subjects, Naftali Furst of Haifa and Alex Moskovic of Florida, played leading roles in the nomination process.

In July, Kinderblock 66 played to a full house at the Jerusalem Film Festival. Following the screening, Irena Steinfeldt, the Director of Yad Vashem's Righteous Among the Nations Department stood before the rapt audience and announced that Yad Vashem had granted Kalina the recognition he so richly deserved. For the survivors and their descendants, it was a bittersweet moment – a long overdue oversight had been corrected, but there are no surviving members of Kalina's family to accept his honour.

Today, as we remember heroes like Raoul Wallenberg and Antonin Kalina, we must consider other unsung heroes of the Holocaust for whom there may be no one left to tell their story.

The writer is the producer of the documentary film Kinderblock 66: Return to Buchenwald.

Special report

Uriel Heilman
JTA

For Greg Schneider, the first sign that something was amiss at the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany came on a significant date: Nov. 9, 2009, the anniversary of Kristallnacht.

Schneider had been at the helm of the Claims Conference, which administers the distribution of billions of dollars in Holocaust reparations from Germany, for less than five months when a telephone operator responsible for talking to survivors and entering data noted something highly unusual.

An application for payment from Germany's Hardship Fund, which grants one-time payouts of 2,556 euro – approximately $3,150 today – to Jews who fled the Nazis as they swept eastward through Europe, had been approved in less than three weeks. The process normally takes months.

A senior staffer was called, and the application was brought to Schneider. He found it curious but didn't think too much of it until a week later, when a similar irregularity cropped up on another submission. Schneider's heart dropped.

He summoned the senior staffer, whom I'll call M., into his office, and the two began feverishly reviewing applications. They stayed up all night searching for patterns and outliers among thousands of claims, scrutinizing dates of birth, places of residence, wartime experiences and Claims Conference caseworkers. The more anomalies they found, the more nervous Schneider became.

By morning it was clear that they had stumbled onto a massive fraud, in all likelihood perpetrated by their own employees.

Schneider, now 45, immediately phoned the chairman of the Claims Conference board, Julius Berman, a prominent member of New York's Jewish community and an attorney at the law firm Kaye Scholer.

"Listen, we've got a problem," Schneider told Berman. "It's not me and it's not [M.], but I can't be sure of anyone else."

Over the next couple of days, Berman, Schneider and senior leaders at the Claims Conference tried to figure out a game plan. If word was to leak that the organization had allowed millions of dollars to be fraudulently obtained from Germany in the name of Holocaust survivors, it could jeopardize the Claims Conference's entire operations, its relationship with the Germans and the distribution of hundreds of millions of dollars to Holocaust survivors around the world.

The disclosure could sully the whole Jewish effort to recoup compensation for Jewish suffering at the hands of the Nazis.

The Claims Conference had been leading that effort, with varying success, since 1951, when the organization was founded by the Israeli government and a consortium of Jewish organizations to represent the Jewish people in negotiations with Germany and Austria for Holocaust reparations. Never in the six-decade history of the organization had theft of this scale ever been discovered.

"I was petrified somebody would find this out before we could make it clear that we were on top of it," Schneider said. "I insisted we go to the authorities immediately."

Berman says he didn't want the organization to fall into the "Nixon trap."

"We would never be able to recover from someone charging that we tried to cover up," he said.

But the lawyers retained by the Claims Conference immediately after discovering the fraud counselled a different path: Wait a bit and see what else could be turned up in order to build a convincing enough case for federal investigators to get involved.

From farm to (negotiating) table

If things had gone a little differently for Schneider, he might have been a chicken egg farmer in rural New England rather than the head of the organization that oversees billions of what many Jews describe as "holy money."

Raised on a family farm in Fitchville, Conn., in the sparsely populated south-eastern corner of the state, Schneider came from a family that had been breeding chicken eggs for four generations.

His Russian-born great-grandfather, Nathan Kofkoff, had gone to Connecticut in the early 20th century, part of a mass movement of urban Jews who were encouraged to leave the city and move to the country to farm rural plots of land. The program was fuelled by interest-free loans from the Baron de Hirsch Fund, which sought to promote agricultural work for Jewish immigrants in the U.S. Within a few years, the vast majority of the newly minted farmers had failed and returned to the city, but the Kofkoffs found a market for their eggs and they stayed.

That decision might have made Schneider the heir to a vast family fortune had his paternal grandfather, Abe Schneider – a Brooklyn boy who married into the family and moved up to the farm – gone into the egg business.

The Jewish World

Greg Schneider

Steering Claims Conference past a $57m fraud

But Greg Schneider's city-boy granddaddy was too weak to haul the chicken feed and instead opened up a plumbing supply store in town. Abe's brother-in-law – Greg's great-uncle – took over the business, eventually turning it into one of America's largest egg producers. With annual revenues of $50 million to $100 million and a production run of 12 million eggs per week, the Kofkoff Egg Farm conglomerate was sold a few years ago to Land O'Lakes, one of the largest dairy companies in America. Though Schneider's grandparents had quit the egg business, they never left the farmstead. When Schneider's father, Raymond, married a New Yorker – the daughter of Orthodox Jewish Hungarian immigrants whose families had stayed behind in Europe and were murdered by the Nazis – she joined him in Connecticut.

It was an alluring new life for Schneider's mother, Roslyn, who sought to escape the urban, Orthodox setting of her youth and embrace her new husband's largely secular, rural life.

By the time Greg was born, however, the family had begun embracing a more observant Jewish lifestyle. While his two older siblings had attended public schools in Connecticut, where the name Schneider stuck out like a piece of pickled herring in a shrimp cocktail, the much younger Greg was sent to a Conservative Jewish day school even though it was more than an hour's commute each way by car.

It was a group trip to Israel at age 15 with the Conservative movement's youth arm, United Synagogue Youth, that Schneider credits with sparking his yearning for a Jewish path.

"After a few days in Israel, I felt more at home and more connected than I did in 15 years on the farm," Schneider said. "I didn't fit in with that farm life. I always knew I wanted to do Jewish."

But Schneider didn't want to be a rabbi. He wanted to lead a major Jewish organization. So he went to Brandeis for college, earned a master's degree in Jewish professional leadership, interned at the Boston Jewish federation and married an Orthodox Jewish woman from Brooklyn.

Schneider's Jewish career then took a detour: he ran a board games company that he and a partner launched.

They struck it big with a 1991 game called Rhymation that became a bestseller at FAO Schwarz, the New York toy company. Today, vintage copies of Rhymation – its trademarked slogan, "The rhyming sensation that's sweeping the nation," is a Schneider original – are selling for $200 on eBay. The slogan still makes Schneider grin – and cringe.

But Schneider gradually returned to the professional track he envisioned, attending Harvard to get a master's degree in public policy at the Kennedy School and then moving to New York in 1995 to take a job at the Claims Conference.

He started off as an assistant to the founding chief of the organization, Saul Kagan, and eventually worked his way up to chief operating officer – the organization's No. 2. In July 2009, when the top post was vacated by Gideon Taylor, the organization's board chose Schneider as his successor. At age 42, he finally had landed his dream job.

Then came the fraud.

The crooks had been at it for years

Days of reckoning

For the first few weeks after discovering that the Claims Conference was being cheated, Schneider barely slept. Never very polished-looking – Schneider's shirts appear perennially rumpled and his light-brown hair grows unkempt as the day progresses – Schneider appeared more dishevelled than usual.

In an instant, his job had changed from convincing Germany to increase its assistance to aging survivors to trying to prevent the entire edifice of the Claims Conference from collapsing under the weight of a fraud of unknown magnitude. Separating credible claims from fake ones was a mammoth task, and it wasn't immediately clear whether the Claims Conference was dealing with hundreds of scammers or a small group of corrupt insiders. The only thing for sure was that the crooks had been at it for years.

Uncertain of the extent of the conspiracy among his staff, Schneider had to make sure that no employees discovered the internal investigation.

"There were many horrible parts, but that pretending was horrendous," Schneider recalls. "We had 100 people working on this fund worldwide, and every one of them had to be lied to."

On Dec. 5, 2009, Schneider abruptly halted all payments to survivors from the Hardship Fund. He told his staff at the Claims Conference offices in New York, Germany and Israel that the monthly wire transfers were delayed because of a computer problem. In truth, he had to make sure that no new checks were issued to fake claimants.

By this time, more than $5 million in fraudulent payments had been discovered.

On Dec. 18 of the same year, about a month into the internal investigation, the Claims Conference and its lawyers from the firm Proskauer Rose were ready to go to the FBI. Schneider flew to Berlin to inform his interlocutors at the German Finance Ministry, and the organization's lawyers took their dossier of evidence to the U.S. Attorney's Office. FBI investigators instructed the Claims Conference not to tell anyone else.

Gradually, the mechanics of the fraud began to come into focus.

A group of corrupt Russian-speaking employees of the Claims Conference had hired recruiters to canvass the Russian-speaking community in New York for immigrants to provide birth certificates, passports and other identifying materials. The conspirators then altered the documents to make it appear as if the immigrants fit the criteria required for Hardship Fund payments, changing dates of birth, places of prewar residence and even photographs. With some deft forgery, a Ukrainian Christian born in the 1950s could be transformed into a Jewish refugee who fled the Nazis and thus was eligible for compensation from Germany.

Inside the Claims Conference, employee accomplices issued quick approvals to the fake applications. Some of the conspirators received as much as $1,000 per applicant for their trouble.

Recruiters got a cut, too, and payment also eventually made its way to those who provided the original documents – many of whom, investigators later discovered, were unaware that they were participating in a fraudulent scheme.

The story was on the front page

Investigators also discovered that another, much larger German account, the Article 2 Fund, which provides monthly pensions of about $300 to 60,000 Holocaust survivors, had been defrauded.

The ringleader on both counts, according to federal investigators, was Semen Domnitser, the director of the Hardship and Article 2 funds. Domnitser, who through his lawyer declined to be interviewed for this story, maintains that he is innocent.

Even today, it's not clear who among those whose names appeared in the fraudulent applications were aware that they were participating in a deception and who were unwitting accomplices. Over the last couple of years, as the Claims Conference has contacted recipients of the ill-gotten gains to return the money, many have complied. The Claims Conference has recovered about $4.3 million; another $3.3 million is scheduled to be returned by recipients in installment plans. While the FBI probe widened and restitution payments remained suspended, word spread among Claims Conference staff that something unusual was afoot. One of the suspects, Faina Davidson, left the country. She later would plead guilty to one count of conspiracy to commit mail fraud.

A senior staff member investigating the theft received a threatening letter. The Claims Conference hired a security guard for the office. Federal investigators arranged for witnesses to wear undercover wires.

Finally, in early 2010, the Claims Conference began confronting employees. Nobody confessed.

On Feb. 10 of that year, Schneider fired three employees, including Domnitser, and had security guards escort them out of the building.

Schneider then made an announcement to the media. The fraud figure: $7 million and counting.

The ensuing months were a blur. The Claims Conference found that the fraud at the Article 2 Fund dated back at least to 1993 and exceeded $24 million. More than 200 suspicious pensions were suspended.

On Nov. 9, 2010, a year to the day after Schneider was handed the first irregular case, the FBI arrested 11 more suspects, unsealed its federal indictment and held a news conference to lay out the case of how Claims Conference employees managed to steal more than $42 million from the German government in the name of Holocaust survivors.

The next day, the story was on the front page of The New York Times.

As the months wore on, the number of arrests and the total fraud figure have continued to climb. To date, 31 people have been arrested and the figure is now at more than $57 million.

Twelve of the 31 people charged in the case have pleaded guilty, four of them ex-Claims Conference employees. The most recent plea came in June: Zlata Blavatnik, a former clerk at the organization, pleaded guilty to conspiracy to commit fraud. She was charged with knowingly collecting documents from ineligible applicants to be used in the submission of fraudulent application to the Hardship Fund. She faces a maximum prison sentence of 40 years.

The first sentence connected to the conspiracy was handed down last August in U.S. District Court in Manhattan: a year in prison and two years' probation for a 63-year-old Russian immigrant from Brooklyn named Polina Anoshina who had recruited some 30 people for the scheme. The crime netted her $9,000 and cost the Claims Conference about $105,000 in fraudulent claims. Anoshina's lawyer called her "a very small part of a very large wheel."

Two others who have pleaded guilty have been sentenced. Tatyana Grinman was given six months in prison and six months of home confinement. Rozaliya Brodetskaya was given two years' probation.

The 19 others who have been charged in the case and pleaded not guilty, including Domnitser, are set to face trial beginning Jan. 14.

It still will be some time before the Claims Conference has completed its review of applications and knows exactly how widespread the fraud was. It has found 3,839 fraudulent Hardship Fund applications totaling $12.3 million in fraudulent payments and 1,112 fraudulent Article 2 Fund cases, amounting to another $45 million.

"I want all these people to go to prison," Schneider said. "It makes me sick how they put in jeopardy our programs and our relationships."

'Survivors have flooded our office with calls'

Accountability

When the British phone-hacking scandal erupted last summer, the head of Scotland Yard, Paul Stephenson, quickly resigned. It wasn't because he'd done anything wrong, he said, but because he didn't want to become a distraction for the agency.

At the Claims Conference, where the fraud went on for at least 17 years, there haven't been any resignations at the top.

"Anxious survivors have flooded our office with calls asking why senior leadership of the Claims Conference didn't resign in the wake of the fraud on their watch, and why they did not even apologize to the survivor community," Elan Steinberg, vice-president of the American Gathering of Holocaust Survivors and their Descendants and a frequent critic of the Claims Conference, said in late 2011, a few months before his death from cancer in April. "I simply have had no answer for them."

Berman, who has chaired the conference for the last decade or so, says there's no reason for him to step aside.

"I feel no fault at all," he said. "Whether I'm a lay chairman or a CEO, it's the kind of process that I had nothing whatsoever to do with instituting."

Calling the controls that the Claims Conference had in place to prevent fraud "reasonably adequate," Berman said the deception was as impossible to anticipate as the attacks of 9/11. "Until it happens once," he added. "Then you're on notice that something you never foresaw can happen."

Schneider's predecessor, Gideon Taylor, under whose 10-year tenure the fraud ran undetected, declined to be interviewed on the subject.

"The day I left I made a decision: I'm not going to speak publicly about the Claims Conference because I've moved on," Taylor said. "It is what it is."

Taylor is now COO of programs at the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, which distributes hundreds of millions of dollars in Jewish aid annually around the world – approximately $110 million of which comes from the Claims Conference. The money, designated for aid programs to Jews in Eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union, constitutes slightly less than one-third of the JDC's total annual budget.

Schneider, who was COO of the Claims Conference when the fraud was happening before he became the organization's chief executive, said the notion that he should be the one to resign is misplaced and counterproductive. Schneider, whose formal title is executive vice president, says he's indispensable and that nobody is more committed or better suited to rooting out the fraud.

"There's too much at stake here," Schneider said. "It would be detrimental to the organization. It would be detrimental to survivors. The results are more important than the symbolism of a resignation."

Schneider appears to have the confidence of the U.S. Attorney's Office, which at practically every news conference related to the fraud makes a point of hailing the Claims Conference's "extraordinary continued cooperation in this investigation."

"We again thank the Claims Conference for their outstanding ongoing assistance in identifying the participants in this scheme," Manhattan U.S. Attorney Preet Bharara said last Oct. 12 at a news conference announcing the most recent arrests in the case – eight additional people.

Perhaps most important, the Germans seem to trust Schneider.

As evidence, Schneider and others point out that since the fraud was discovered, the German government actually has increased its allocations through the Claims Conference – most notably for home care for infirm survivors. In 2009, Germany's home care funding amounted to 30 million euro. In 2012, the figure will be 126 million euro – approximately $168 million – and Germany has committed to additional funding at least through 2014.

German officials declined to be interviewed for this story.

External consultant reviewing the changes

But Stuart Eizenstat, a former U.S. undersecretary of state who has been a key player in negotiating a number of Holocaust-related deals and is a regular at the negotiations between the Claims Conference and the German Finance Ministry, says the organization's relationship with the Germans has weathered the fraud crisis because of confidence and trust built up over decades. Also, he says, because of the steps that Schneider put in place upon discovering the fraud: better internal auditing, improved internal controls and greater transparency vis-a-vis Germany.

Germany, however, has added its own auditors, who now also oversee the flow of funds from Germany through the Claims Conference and on to survivors.

Germany is satisfied with how the Claims Conference is addressing the theft

Eizenstat credits the Germans for not using the fraud as a pretext to decrease financial assistance for Jewish victims of the Nazis.

"Greg is an extremely strong operational person, and that has helped a lot," Eizenstat said. "But it's not just on the Claims Conference. It is the Germans' continued willingness to live up to their obligations and not using excuses to diminish it."

Though the German Finance Ministry has been loath to discuss the fraud publicly, the official who represents Germany in negotiations with the Claims Conference, Werner Gatzert, state secretary of the German Finance Ministry, said in Washington on July 10 that a "spirit of cooperation and trust" guides the negotiations process.

A ministry spokesman also released a brief statement suggesting that Germany is satisfied with how the Claims Conference is addressing the theft.

"The Federal Finance Ministry very much regrets the delays Holocaust survivors may have experienced in receiving financial assistance from the German Federal Government owing to the irregularities at the New York office of the JCC" (Jewish Claims Conference), the statement said.

"The JCC has been systematically researching its records for signs of irregularities and has taken appropriate steps to reclaim the misappropriated funds. The JCC has also taken disciplinary measures against the employees involved in the irregularities," the statement said. "The JCC's internal processes regarding financial assistance to Holocaust survivors have undergone a substantial overhaul. An external consultant has been reviewing these changes to ensure that they provide adequate protection against criminal misappropriations in the future."

"The Ministry, the General Consulate in New York City and the German embassy in Washington are being informed about the progress of the investigations and will not comment any further on these cases."

The question of legacy

When I first met Schneider in 2003, it was clear he had greater ambitions than serving as an operational man.

It wasn't so much that Schneider wanted to run the show – though he did – but that he wanted a place at the table in Berlin, fighting for restitution of a debt that Germany could never repay to survivors and six million murdered Jews even if it had all the money in the world.

In a way, Schneider got what he wanted. He flies to Europe more often than he visits his parents on the Connecticut farm, his BlackBerry never stops buzzing and he plays a unique role in setting the agenda at one of the Jewish world's most moneyed organizations.

Yet he still doesn't look the part of a Jewish leader. When we met late one evening at a Starbucks in Riverdale, N.Y., the heavily Jewish Bronx neighbourhood where Schneider lives with his wife and kids, he showed up in sneakers and a backward-facing baseball cap. The coffee shop wasn't far from the Hebrew Institute of Riverdale, the Orthodox synagogue where Schneider and his family worship on the Sabbath. Every week at the end of services, Schneider and the other congregants line up for hugs from the rabbi, Avi Weiss.

When Schneider became the Claims Conference's chief in July 2009, I visited him in his first week on the job to ask what his priorities were for the survivors' twilight years.

"Home care, so survivors can remain in their own homes," he said. "Pensions for 8,000 concentration camp survivors who do not receive any. Payment for nearly 100,000 Nazi victims in Eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union who do not qualify for the Hardship Fund because they never left their home countries. More money for social welfare services that for some survivors will mean the difference between a hot meal and no meal, between seeing a doctor and not seeing a doctor."

Three years on, Schneider's record on those goals is mostly positive.

Annual home care funding has increased more than fourfold, with about 55,000 Jewish survivors worldwide now receiving subsidized home care. The Claims Conference has managed to gain recognition and funding by the German government for new classes of survivors, from ghetto survivors who worked as "non-forced" labourers to thousands of Jews who fled the Nazis as they swept through Europe and then settled behind the Iron Curtain. Any Jew who spent time in a concentration camp and has a special hardship is now entitled to a German government pension; until recently, only those who were in the camps for six months or more qualified. The pension amount also has risen slightly. And in July, Germany agreed to expand its Hardship Fund payouts to survivors in Russia and Ukraine, adding an estimated 80,000 additional people to the list at an estimated expense of $300 million.

But then, of course, there's the fraud.

For a year and a half after it was discovered, not a day went by that Schneider or a member of his staff did not talk with the FBI. Ten full-time staffers were hired to review and reprocess claims dating back over a decade. Always a magnet for disgruntled survivors, the Claims Conference became even more of a lightning rod for criticism.

And media attention, which has focused more on the theft than on the Claims Conference's accomplishments, has been a source of great frustration for Schneider.

"I don't want to talk about the fraud anymore," Schneider said. "I would like this chapter to be over."

But investigators are still reviewing claims to separate the fictitious ones from the real ones, and when the remaining defendants go on trial next year, the fraud will be back in the headlines.

In the long run, Schneider says the fraud will be but a footnote of history, with the real story of the Claims Conference – and Schneider's own legacy there – the money and assistance it was able to get to aging survivors in their final years.

"There are a huge amount of distractions that could take us off course, but despite the fraud and issues of governance and 15 other things, I feel it is my job to align people back to our core mission," Schneider said. "This is the last moment of the last generation of survivors. We have to give them the dignity they deserve. We only have a few years left when we can still make a difference."

How can you possibly say 'enough'? It won't be enough until the very last survivor, and even then it won't be enough

Recently, Schneider met in Washington with German government representatives to demand more money for survivors. Even though it was malfeasance by the Claims Conference's own employees that resulted in more than $57 million being defrauded from Germany, Schneider is unrelenting when it comes to occupying the moral high ground in negotiations with the Germans.

"The Germans say, when will it ever end? Hasn't it been enough already?" Schneider said of restitution for Nazi crimes against the Jews.

"The suffering hasn't ended. The nightmares haven't ended," he said of the survivors. "How can you possibly say 'enough'? It won't be enough until the very last survivor, and even then it won't be enough."

Cyber warfare

Ben Sales
JTA

TEL AVIV – As the frequency of suicide bombings increased in the 1990s, Israelis began to realize that their conflicts had shifted from the conventional battlefield to their streets, buses and cafes.

Now the country – along with the rest of the world – is adapting to a new battlefield, one that defence experts call the “fifth dimension”: computers.

The impact cannot be underestimated, says Dror Mor, CEO of the Sdema Group, an Israeli company that specializes in homeland security protection.

“A big part of the next war, wherever it is in the world, will be cyber warfare to silence infrastructure, electricity, communications, movement of planes and trains,” he says.

Land, air, sea and even space have been battlefronts for decades or centuries, but cyber warfare has gained prominence in open, which is good for business, but when that happens it's bad for security,” says Avi Weissman, chairman of the Israeli Forum for Information Security. “States have learned to take advantage of this to create malicious code.”

As Gauss showed, cyber warfare threatens private companies and governments. Transportation systems are especially vulnerable, Mor says.

“Someone can go in the system, confuse the stoplights and create big economic problems,” he says. A crisis also would ensue, Mor adds. “If you get into the Israeli train system and put two trains on the same track that have no idea that they're going toward each other.”

As to private companies, vulnerability to cyber attacks means that the actions of ordinary office employees could lead to a breach in a system's security.

“It's a cultural change as to how an organization deals with protection,” Mor says. “You're in an organization, you have a laptop and a flash drive. The flash drive you use with your computer and the computer in the office. How do we create a separation between the company network and the outside world?”

Mor adds that the dangers stretch even beyond national defence and safeguarding civilian infrastructure.

“If they stop the creation of cottage cheese, you think there will be a problem here?” he asks rhetorically, referring to a staple of the Israeli diet. “People can't live without cottage cheese.”

Defence threats, however, especially concern information security experts in Israel, a country where national security issues dominate conversation. In fact, last year Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu launched the National Cyber Staff, which is charged with improving Israel's defences against cyber warfare.

Israel has not fought a full-scale conventional war against another country in nearly four decades, principally fighting terror groups since the 1980s. Still, the biggest cyber threats come from countries which have the necessary manpower to develop and execute a damaging attack, according to Isaac Ben-Israel, a professor of security and diplomacy at Tel Aviv University and former head of military research and development for the Israeli Defence Forces and Defence Ministry.

“Terror groups work with small groups of people, so the likelihood that they'll attack our system is small,” Ben-Israel says.

Israel also is the birthplace of internationally well-regarded information security companies such as the Sdema Group. But some experts say the country remains unprepared to meet potential cyber threats.

“We're OK relative to the world, but we are not OK relative to the threats in the region,” Ben-Israel says.

A big part of the next war will be to silence infrastructure

the past few years and will continue to advance. Although some industries have been computerized for more than 50 years, increasingly complex viruses have made computers more vulnerable than ever to cyber attacks.

Several viruses already have figured prominently in the Middle East. In 2010, the Stuxnet virus hit computers in Iran's nuclear enrichment facilities, and observers say it set back the Islamic Republic's alleged nuclear weapons program by as much as two years.

Three months ago, Iran acknowledged that another virus, allegedly created by Israel and the U.S. and called Flame, had infected its computers. According to the Washington Post, the virus tapped into Iranian computer networks and accessed intelligence.

And earlier this month Gauss, a virus related to Stuxnet, hit personal computers in Lebanon and Israel, enabling the cyber attackers to access financial data and the social network profiles of tens of thousands of people.

Synagogue offers a glimpse into lives of 'Pope's Jews'

Lorna Poplak
Special to The CIN

The citizens of the town of Cavaillon in Provence can't lay claim to the oldest synagogue in France: it's the second oldest. Actually, Cavaillon wasn't even part of France when the original synagogue was built in the 15th century or when its replacement went up on the same site three centuries later. At that time, the town was in a separate region called the Comtat Venaissin.

The synagogue is in the old town centre, sitting above an arched passageway at the northern end of a short cobbled street called the rue Hébraïque. To reach it, you climb a flight of stone stairs onto a balcony. The inscription above the entrance to the synagogue reads: "This is the gate of the Lord, into which the righteous shall enter" and the Hebrew date 5534, corresponding to 1774 CE, the year the building was completed. Nothing so far prepares you for the marvel that greets your eye as you step into the high-ceilinged room.

The first surprise is the decor. It's in the highly decorative Rococo style, with elegantly carved woodwork, delicate wrought iron, graceful candelabra hanging from the ceilings, and a colour palette of pastel pink, blue, green, and lots and lots of gold. There is a wrought-iron balcony supported by four wooden pillars on the west side of the room – not the women's section, as you might expect, but the bimah. It was from here that the rabbi, sometimes surrounded by local dignitaries, presided over services.

On the east wall is the gilded ark with columns and intricately carved floral motifs. This odd setup meant that the congregation would have to turn away from the sacred Torah scrolls in the ark to face the rabbi. Compounding the quirkiness of the layout is the small armchair perched high up in a corner of the room, hovering atop a puff of Rococo clouds. This is known as Elijah's chair, and the prophet was asked to bless the circumcisions performed beneath it.

The Jewish World

Cavaillon Synagogue Ark (Lorna Poplak photos)

The main sanctuary on the upper floor was for men only; there was a separate room below for the women. This was also a bakery, and you can still see the old oven where matzot – called coudoles in Provençal – were baked. The women could hear the services through a tunnel in the oven. The bakery is now the Comtadin Jewish museum. On display are a few manuscripts and other ritual objects. Among these relics is a poignant photograph of an old Jewish woman, wearing traditional Provençal dress, taken in the community in 1913.

Other than the synagogue and museum, the only buildings of significance to the history of Cavaillon Jews remaining on this street are an old house, where the last rabbi of the community lived, and the medieval mikvah. The mikvah is currently undergoing restoration and is closed to the public.

A haunting window to the past

Stairs leading up to the Cavaillon Synagogue

The synagogue in Cavaillon was constructed not by Jews, but by local Provençal builders, which might explain some of its stylistic oddities. Jews had lived in the south of France from the time of Roman Gaul and enjoyed relative freedom until towards the end of the Middle Ages. In the 1300s, however, they were banished and expelled from France. Many of them found sanctuary in Avignon, at that time ruled by the Vatican. Under the protection of a series of popes, they were allowed to live and work in Avignon and in the surrounding region, the Comtat Venaissin, as tradesmen and craftsmen. These so-called Pope's Jews were tailors and dyers, masons and woodworkers, even doctors and surgeons. Gradually, their situation deteriorated, and by the 17th century they had lost most of their freedoms and certainly, their freedom to work. They were only allowed to work as secondhand clothing and furniture dealers, and as moneylenders.

Jews were also restricted in where they could live. The rue Hébraïque, with the synagogue at one end, was Cavaillon's old carrière. The term carrière comes from the Provençal word carreira, which means street, but in the medieval context the word took on a darker meaning. Jews were obligated to live in these small streets, which, from the mid-15th century, were gated at either end. The gates were locked at night, effectively creating ghettos. By the 18th century, more than 200 people were crammed into tottering tenements rising six or seven storeys high on either side of the rue Hébraïque.

Life for the Jews in Provence improved greatly after the French Revolution of 1789. The carrières were abolished soon afterward, and Jews from the Papal territories were allowed to integrate into the wider French community.

So which is the oldest synagogue in modern-day France? That honour goes to the synagogue in Carpentras, just a few kilometres north, with the Cavaillon Synagogue coming in a close second. As so few Jewish families now live in the area, the Cavaillon synagogue is no longer used as a place of worship. For visitors, it's a haunting window into the lives of the Pope's Jews in old Provence.

Israeli eco-innovations go global

Palm trees growing in the Arava Desert

Karin Kloosterman
Israel21c.com

The Jewish World

1. Look to the ancients

"We've done a lot of research on ecosystem response to drought because we have this problem on our doorstep," says Prof. Pedro Berliner, director of the Jacob Blaustein Institute for Desert Research at Ben-Gurion University in the Negev Desert.

Berliner's area of research is the Nabateans, who lived in Israel more than 2,000 years ago in the heart of the Negev, yet found a way to survive and thrive. How did they build a sustainable community that provided food, firewood and fodder for animals?

Based on his research, Berliner has developed a modern-day version of the Nabatean floodwater collection system and travels the world teaching farmers in countries such as Kenya, Turkmenistan, Uzbekistan, India, and Mexico how to implement it. His low-tech approach redirects floodwaters to dike-surrounded plots or hand-dug pits in which trees or shrubs are planted.

Going one step further than the Nabateans, "In our system we not only plant trees and, between them, rows of crops, but gave the old a new twist by using legume shrub-like trees which can absorb atmospheric nitrogen through their root system," Berliner says. Soil fertility is maintained at practically no cost, ensuring long-term sustainability.

2. Make the most from the sun

In developing nations, people still cut trees for firewood. This causes desertification, as vegetation which held the soil and its nutrients in place is lost. Rain washes away topsoil, leaving worthless sand behind.

Israel's advances in off-grid solar energy power plants for homes or villages can help offer a clean, renewable alternative to fuel wood. Ben-Gurion Prof. David Faiman has developed a concentrator photovoltaic (CPV) cell perfect for developing nations facing desertification, and he's just one of dozens of Israeli researchers and companies working in this direction.

"Israel is helping combat desertification by making solar power a viable alternative to... chopping down trees for firewood," Berliner says.

The only country with a net gain of trees

3. Help fish swim in the desert

Vast desert land need not go to waste when practical high-value crops – especially alternative ones like aquaculture – can thrive there. Professors Shmuel Appelbaum and Dina Zilber from Ben-Gurion University helped perfect a system to grow fish in the desert.

Their system takes low-quality brackish water – water with a high salt content – and pumps it into pools for raising marine fish. This provides an entirely new source of protein, and income, for desert-dwellers. The conditions in some deserts are also optimal for raising aquarium fish, and Israel is starting to harvest attractive guppies for export to Europe.

4. Grow crops in the sand

As with aquaculture, another surprising crop can thrive in the hot desert sun: Fed with brackish or low-quality water, algae for either biofuels or nutraceuticals offer a new way to grow a high-value product on seemingly worthless land. Several Israeli companies and research institutions are working to create the optimal environment for this plant-based microorganism, as well as genetic engineering to produce algae containing more lipids, which can be transformed into biofuel.

Ben-Gurion University, the Weizmann Institute and the Technion Israel Institute of Technology have joined forces to accelerate this research. Meanwhile, companies like Seambiotics already have commercial products harvested straight from the desert.

Other alternative crops that Israel is growing in the desert include argan trees, prized for their oil. Formerly, the trees could only grow in the Atlas Mountains in Morocco. Israel also has a national program for irrigating olive groves with brackish water. "It is working well and definitely the only place where this is being done," says Berliner.

5. Build green

Israel is known for its expertise in building desert-adapted houses, often from blueprints designed and tested in the desert by the Blaustein Institute's desert architecture and urban planning unit. These houses require no air-conditioning, even during the day when the heat is most intense.

Eco-architect Isaac Meir specializes in passive low-energy architecture (PLEA) for hot, arid climates. Factors such as wind direction, sun angles and daily temperatures are taken into consideration. In 2001, he co-authored Climate Responsive Architec- ture – A Design Handbook for Energy Efficient Building, which has attracted global attention.

6. Harvest more crop per drop

You can't talk about Israel's success in making the desert bloom without mentioning Israeli companies innovating in the field of drip irrigation in hot, dry climates, including Plastro, Netafim and NaanDan Jain.

Unlike much of the innovation in Israel that starts in the lab or research institute, modern drip irrigation was pioneered by farmers themselves, and is widely used across Israel to get the best crops from the least water. Israeli techniques are shared with other countries through the Foreign Ministry's MASHAV Centre for International Cooperation.

Netafim worker

7. Research the roots

The government-owned agricultural research organization, the Volcani Institute in Beit Dagan, is known for producing genetic variants of plants that perform very well in less than ideal conditions. There, scientists not only study drought resistance in plants, but also breed new varieties of vegetables and fruits to get the maximum yield for the volume of water, helping Israeli farmers and seed-sellers to find a wider market.

The centre also researches ancient strains of wheat, such as emmer, eaten during biblical times, as well as pest resistance and biological controls that use fewer resources and chemicals.

Nearby in Rehovot, scientists at the Faculty of Agriculture of the Hebrew University are also working to improve Israeli tomatoes and field crop resistance and yields.

Wild emmer wheat

8. Keep on planting

Israel is the only country over the last 100 years to see a net gain of trees. Tree planting can reverse desertification by supporting the earth as plant life grows roots into the sand, creating a cycle of nutrients that nourish the soil.

Planting trees through the Karen Kayemeth Lelsrael-Jewish National Fund is a worldwide Jewish priority, and a model that many countries have copied as they attempt to afforest their lost lands. KKL-JNF also researches which trees grow well in the desert, surviving on winter runoff alone, and which do better in wetter, more temperate zones like the Galilee region.

9. Share the knowledge

Back in the 1950s, the Israeli government under Golda Meir founded MASHAV in order to share Israel's expertise in desert agriculture. MASHAV runs a variety of programs, but is best known for its training seminars in Israel and wherever needed – Africa, the Middle East, South America, Central America, India, China – on techniques ranging from greenhouse management and irrigation to fish farming and dairy farming. The MASHAV-sponsored program TIPA (meaning "drop") has helped more than 700 Senegalese farming families earn a living with drip irrigation.

10. Preserve precious water

Almost all of these Israeli successes hinge on wastewater management, on a scale that no other country has ever matched. The country that comes closest to Israel's level of water reuse is Spain, which only reuses about 20 per cent, while in Israel, a whopping 50 per cent of irrigated water comes from recycled wastewater, according to Berliner, much of it recycled through JNF-planted forests.

Senegalese farmers visit Israel

We would like to take this opportunity to wish all of our patients, family and friends a year of good health and happiness. And may we see peace in Israel and around the world.

The Jewish calendar, for home and office, provides a framework for both the spiritual and practical aspects of Jewish life. When decorated with magnificent illustrations, both of historical and aesthetic interest, these calendars gain a third dimension.

On the spiritual level the Jewish calendar provides the dates of all the Jewish holidays (both solemn and festive), and reminds us every week which Torah portion, and which portion from the prophets, is read in the synagogue, and gives the times for lighting Sabbath and holiday candles.

On a practical level, today's calendars come with all sorts of other information, and with images of Judaica treasures, whose significance and origins, form a virtual history lesson about the glorious culture and civilization of the Jewish people. Speaking through textiles, metals, paintings, sculptures, prints and ceremonial objects, these images give expression to the Jewish experience through the centuries, and through many lands.

This year Pomegranate publishers have produced two calendars for the wall. Illustrated with works from the Jewish Museum in New York, the Jewish Museum Calendar 2013 features a Ketubah (marriage contract) from Isfahan, Persia (1875); a 1913 painting by Max Ernst (View from Franz Balke's Window...in Bon), and Marc Chagall's Me and My Village (c. 1911).

But the focus, in this Pomegranate calendar is mostly on more contemporary art, such as a Menorah, Tree of Life by Erte (1987); Fabric Designed for Synagogue Curtains, by Ludwig Wolpert (1959); Harriete Berman's Seder Plate (2000); and Grisha Bruskin's sculpture, The Wrestler (Jacob and the Angel), 1995-6).

The second Pomegranate wall calendar, Jewish Celebrations, is decorated with paintings by Malka Zeldis, whose vibrant colours bring to life the joys of Jewish tradition.

Zeldis' paintings capture the fine threads connecting the spiritual and the domestic in Jewish life and celebrations. Each monthly illustration comes with explanatory notes, about the customs and significance of the scenes depicted. Even the personal art works, such as My Grandmother's Kitchen, Family Scene, or My Mother, come with autobiographical explanations.

From Universe publishers comes one wall calendar and one desk calendar this year. Gracing the pages of the Universe wall calendar are images of items from the collection of the Jewish Historical Museum in Amsterdam. There are paintings, sculptures, ceramics, and a very unusual Shabbat clock, with Hebrew writing on it.

Among the ceremonial objects in this calendar there is a beautiful silver Havdalah Set by Dutch artist Piet Izak Cohen (1998); a charming porcelain and silver challah plate from 19th century Germany; and a handsome copper Chanukah menorah from 18th century Netherlands.

Eduard Frankfort's oil painting, Interior of Jewish Home for Elderly People (Amsterdam, 1880-1920), and Max Liebermann's Alley In The Jewish Quarter of Amsterdam (1908), both exude a certain warmth through the settings and combination of colours used by the artists.

The Universe desk calendar has a very unique feature that makes it a most useful quick reference in the busy home. Besides its numerous illustrations of Judaic treasures found on every page, this calendar has a flowchart with each holiday, festival and fast day on the Jewish calendar.

The concise references to each of the feasts or fasts, cover such categories as the history, theme, mood, and customs, along with Torah readings, candle blessings, and the Hebrew date.

This desk calendar is filled with such a variety of illustrations that it offers a virtual cornucopia of art and precious objects. There is the stunning wedding dress from Rabat, Morocco (19th century); the ultra-modern Torah Shield by Moshe Zabari (Jerusalem, 1958); Abraham Manievich's oil painting, Napoleon Street, Montreal (1930); a unique Ketubah, which contains photographs as part of its colourful decoration (Dina Knapp, 1997); and Reuven Rubin's Goldfish Vendor (1928), to name but a few.

Among the ceremonial objects there is a striking ornate silver menorah (Russia, 1865), which is inscribed with both the year of its production, and with the initials of its owner.

For youngsters there are two delightful calendars this year from Kar-Ben publishers. The first, Sammy Spider's Jewish Calendar, is for the younger child, with brilliant colours, and simple, short comments on the milestones ferent famous story or fairy tale) have been created in neighbourhoods across that one city. There is a 'stop' in Maui, Hawaii, and in Moscow.

Included in this calendar are also entries on such profoundly tragic events as 9/11 and the Holocaust, but they are presented within a larger context of what it means to be Jewish, and a citizen of the world in this 21st century.

One entry in this calendar tells us that, according to South Korea's ambassador to Israel, the Talmud is a constant bestseller in South Korea, a country of 49 million. Almost every home has a Korean version of these volumes, which is called Light of Knowledge. It is even required study in elementary schools. The reason for this interest in the Talmud is the high regard with which the South Koreans have for the achievements of the Jewish people, and for the values learned from the Talmud.

The recipes in this calendar are always suited for the young cook, and take so little time to prepare. For the High Holidays there are Chicken Salad with Apples and Honey, Cranberry Tea, or Cranberry Apple Casserole, which would delight any family. For Chanukah there are chicken latkes.

And this Ashkenazi writer can hardly wait to try making 'folares' for Purim. A traditional breakfast treat, folare dates back to the time the Jews lived in Spain, but continues to be a favourite of Sephardi Jews to this day.

There is also a great and very easy idea for making a Sukkah centerpiece with a hollowed out pumpkin, something even adults will enjoy doing.

Israel braces for 'more tense' region in coming year

Israel Hayom exclusive to JNS.org

Israel Defence Forces (IDF) Director of Military Intelligence Maj. Gen. Aviv Kochavi, in his annual intelligence assessment to Chief of General Staff Lt. Gen. Benny Gantz and the IDF general staff, warned on Aug. 27 that Israel will face an increasingly volatile region in the coming year, one that is "more tense and Islamist in nature than before."

According to Kochavi, the area is "experiencing a series of crises, both regional and internal, which add to the overall sensitivity of the players involved and could lead to unexpected flare-ups."

Kochavi said the annual intelligence assessment "is the result of a long and thorough process of research and analysis."

"The work is led by the research unit and utilizes all of the existing intelligence-gathering bodies in the intelligence branch, as well as ones created in the passing year," he said.

In related news, foreign weapon sales by the United States tripled last year to $66.3 billion as Persian Gulf states sought to build up their military supplies amid growing tensions with Iran, a new report said.

U.S. arms sales reached a record high, up from $21.4 billion in 2010 and $31 billion in 2009, according to a study by the U.S. Congressional Research Service.

Weapons sales declined amid the global economic downturn but increasing tensions with Iran over its nuclear weapons program have seen Gulf countries spend billions of dollars on defence procurement.

Foreign arms sales have become increasingly important to weapons makers as the Pentagon's budget flattens because of U.S. deficit-reduction requirements.

U.S. military deals with Saudi Arabia topped $33.4 billion last year, according to the report. Agreements included the purchase of 84 advanced F-15 fighter

The United Arab Emirates purchased Lockheed Martin's Theatre High Altitude Area Defence system in a deal valued at $3.49 billion last December and 16 Chinook helicopters for $939 million. Oman acquired 18 F-16 fighters for $1.4 billion.

For more evidence of its increasingly precarious position in the Middle East, Israel need not look any further south than neighbouring Egypt. Arab League Secretary-General Nabil Elaraby told the Cairo Review of Global Affairs in an article published this week that Egypt should amend its 1979 peace treaty with Israel because the latter is violating the accords with respect to the Palestinians.

The dynamic of Middle East conflict is changing

Elaraby, 77, was appointed secretary-general in July 2011, after a brief stint as Egyptian foreign minister in the first government of the post-Hosni Mubarak era.

"Israel is violating every day what they have committed themselves to do," Elaraby said.

"What I've been asking is [to] look at every step taken by Israel and see whether it really fits with its commitments," Elaraby said. "I'll tell you: no. I'll just give you one example: Camp David, and I was there. They committed themselves that [UN Resolution] 242 would apply to every single front, or to every single country, which accepts to live in peace with Israel. Fine. Palestinians have said for 20 years now we have recognized Israel, but they don't want to apply 242, they don't want to withdraw, they don't want to stop the settlement activities. They have tens of thousands of prisoners who have been there for over 20 years. They are acting in a wrong way. They claim that they have withdrawn from Gaza, but they are surrounding Gaza and any day they will go and kill people in Gaza and go out. They are the occupiers. It's not necessary in oc-cupping a territory to be in every single yard of territory. They are outside but they are occupying it. So, everything is wrong. You need to rectify the relations. This is not going to work at all. You need to rectify the relations to have a healthy relationship in the future."

Elaraby said that the new situation in the Middle East would change the dynamic of the Arab-Israeli conflict.

"The way that the Israelis were using brute force and not taking into consideration the rights of the people around them, particularly the Palestinians, will have to change," he said. "But they are reading it wrongly. They are claiming to the Americans, to the Europeans, 'It is changing here. We don't know what will happen. We will not talk unless they accept our conditions.' They have to realize that if they want to live in peace with their neighbours, they have a chance to do that. But they have to live in peace, they have to act according to the rules of international law everywhere. [The Arab peace plan] has been there 10 years there now, and it's still there. Ten years, they've not reacted to it."

Elaraby said the Egypt-Israel peace treaty should be amended on the security front, as well as the commercial area.

"People in Egypt under the former regime have added things which are not in the treaty," he said. "People say Camp David requires Egypt to sell gas to Israel. Gas was not there at that time. Camp David and the treaty speak about the right of Israel to bid for oil, which Egypt does not need. But people think that it contains obligations on Egypt to sell oil to Israel, which is not true."

Punish rabbis who preach hatred

ITA

Knesset Speaker Reuven Rivlin recently apologized to Jamal Julany, one of the victims of a racist attack in Zion Square in Jerusalem in mid-August, during his visit to the 17-year-old.

"We are sorry," said Rivlin, a Likud Party leader. He went on to say, "It is hard to see you hospitalized because of an inconceivable act" and "What happened is the responsibility of every leader and member of Knesset."

This time of year on the Jewish calendar especially calls us to evaluate our actions and mend our ways to avoid the same mistakes next year. An honest evaluation will reveal that this unprovoked attack on three Arab youths by dozens of Israeli teenagers is part of a phenomenon much broader than the character of these youths. It is the result of the chronology of prolonged Israeli government tolerance toward Jewish religious extremism and its manifestations, and of the government's tacit acceptance of racist incitement toward Israel's Arab minority by certain members of Knesset and a number of extreme Orthodox rabbis.

Every religion has its extremists; Judaism is no different. Notably in this raging culture war, the chief rabbi of Safed, Shmuel Eliyahu, has repeatedly called Israel's 1.2 million Arab citizens "the enemy" and urged Jews not to rent or sell apartments to Arabs. He also claims that all Arabs have a violent nature. In his manifesto published in March 2008, he wrote, "The time has come to tell the truth. Providing a livelihood for our enemies leads to grave consequences."

Shmuel Eliyahu is not alone. There are approximately 50 state-employed Israeli rabbis who, like Eliyahu, engage openly in racist rhetoric toward non-Jews with impunity. While Israeli law clearly states that racist incitement is a criminal offence, there have been no disciplinary measures or a serious police investigation.

When leading public figures dehumanize others, the descent from hateful speech to violent acts is often swift and severe. These rabbis did not physically attack the three Arab teens still recovering in the hospital, but their words and teachings were a major catalyst and a spiritual motivation for their impressionable young followers to take the next step and actually commit a violent act.

There is a direct connection between the immunity given to rabbis and the ease with which a group of teenagers beat up a 17-year-old Arab boy to "teach him a lesson" about eyeing Jewish girls in Zion Square. If the government of Israel is truly appalled by the attack in Zion Square, here is a suggestion: As the state has the power to fire civil servants who are racists, why not use this power immediately?

The Israel Religious Action Center is monitoring racist statements by rabbis and pursuing legal and public action against them. Our recent report, "Love the Stranger as Yourself? Racism in the Name of Halacha," details this disturbing trend.

Racist incitement recently has taken on a new focus: Jewish women and their purity. In Zion Square, flyers are being distributed in Arabic that read "Our girls are dear to us, just like you don't want a Jew to date your sister, we also are not willing to accept an Arab dating one of our women. Just like you would do anything to stop a Jew from dating your sister, so would we! Last week, an Arab who thought he could come here and find a Jewish girlfriend was hurt. We don't want you to get hurt. Respect the honour of our girls because they are dear to us!"

Misogyny and racism meet again, this time disguised as Judaism. The Israeli Movement for Progressive Judaism is working to answer the questions that these recent events pose: What is our Jewish obligation to the non-Jewish minority in Israel? How do we respond to the objectification of women in service of racism?

Jews in Israel and in the Diaspora must offer answers to these burning questions. Jews everywhere have the responsibility to respond to racist statements by Jewish extremists. It is our duty as Jews to remind others and ourselves that the Torah commands us to love the stranger 36 times more than any other commandment.

Jamal Julany remembers nothing of the attack. He is struggling in his hospital bed to gain back the use of his limbs, his eyes and his ears. We must remind ourselves, and the State of Israel, of every blow he received and demand that the state stop turning a blind eye and a deaf ear to racism in its own ranks.

Young Jewish children study at school

Worry about kids' character, not grades, says author

Lisa Keys
JTA

Not long ago, psychologist Madeline Levine gave a lecture at a Jewish day school near her home in Marin County, Calif. The topic: "Your Average Child."

Nobody showed up.

"I guess there wasn't a single average kid at the school," Levine quips now.

"By definition, the vast majority of our children are average," she clarifies.

It's a tough notion for parents to accept, especially since many of us grew up hearing that we were anything but average — we were special. If our kids are average, does that mean that ultimately we are (gasp!) average, too?

To keep such thoughts at bay, we may follow the typical trajectory: load our kids up with classes and activities. Make sure they get good grades, win trophies. This will land them at a top-tier college where, the story goes, they will graduate and embark upon a well-paid career.

But Levine, author of the new book Teach Your Children Well: Parenting for Authentic Success (HarperCollins Publishers) says parents focus on the wrong things.

Despite today's high-stakes environment, which combines an uncertain economic future with increasingly fierce competition for spots at top schools, we're overlooking our kids' most valuable assets.

"If you spend all this time going over homework, correcting it, bringing in a tutor, you've lost... time to build other things: character, persistence, generosity — all the things that people now are saying are going to be mandatory" for future success.

In her book, Levine writes: "Every measure of child and adolescent mental health has deteriorated since we've decided that children are best served by being relentlessly pushed, overloaded, and tested. Our current version of success is a failure."

It's a trap in which much of the Jewish community finds itself ensnared, Levine says, given our historical emphasis on education.

The Jewish World

Madeline Levine

"There's always this sense that education is the way to go... If your 15-year-old says, 'I don't want to clear the dishes today, I have my AP chemistry test [to study for],' most [Jewish] parents say, 'Don't worry about it, go study.'"

"That's a big mistake. There's more to be learned about the issue of sharing responsibility and community that goes along with three minutes of clearing the table."

While many Jewish schools emphasize community and values, parents too often worry about a botched test.

"We know everything about their grades and not enough about where they go and what they do," she writes. "We monitor their performance, but not their character."

Levine reminds parents of their ultimate goal: "We want to turn out good people who find good partners, find work they like, and contribute to their communities."

Teach Your Children Well is, in part, a response to Levine's previous book, the 2006 surprise bestseller The Price of Privilege: How Parental Pressure and Material Advantage Are Creating a Generation of Disconnected and Unhappy Kids. ("Nobody expected it to end up on the New York Times bestsellers list," she says.)

Levine's background embodies the idea that "average" can become extraordinary. Now 62, she grew up in New York City. Her father was a police officer who died young, and her mother was a social worker.

"We had no money, no insurance, nothing," Levine recalls. She studied at the State University of New York, Buffalo, thanks to a scholarship.

"I had the best parents," Levine says. "I was just fine the way I was, whether that was excelling in English or floundering at math. They were more interested in the kind of person I was."

Levine began her career as a teacher in the South Bronx, a downtrodden, violence-plagued area of New York, in the 1970s. ("I was a terrible teacher," she admits. "I was so bad in the classroom, so good at the one-on-one.")

Levine moved to California, where she still lives, to pursue a doctorate in psychology. She has a private clinical practice – on the back burner at the moment, she says – and is a founder of Challenge Success, a Stanford University-based organization that works with schools and families to promote better balanced, more fulfilled lives for children.

She and her husband, Lee Schwartz, have three sons, aged 32, 27 and 21. Looking back now at what she might have done differently, Levine says she'd participate more in her children's Jewish education.

Busy then with her family and career, she now recalls "all the times I dropped them off at Hebrew school, went home and went to bed," she says. "It's one thing to say, 'You have to go to Mitzvah Day.' Well, if Mom's not going... actions speak louder than words."

Levine's youngest son, Jeremy, was her first inspiration to fight the pressure-cooker environment so many kids encounter at school. While her older sons, good students, "were served by the system," Jeremy ("a perfectly average student") was falling between the cracks.

"There was very little to feel good about, starting in about sixth grade," she says. "Nobody was interested in the parts of him that were super good."

"Every kid has a super power... For one kid, it may be calculus. For another, it's an incredible sensitivity toward people." A parent's task, Levine says, is valuing these strengths equally.

"Life hands people all kinds of losses, disappointments, tragedies... Why do we want to have kids night after night sobbing over their homework at 2 a.m. because they can't get it done? It's something we created that has become an enormous stressor."

"I feel like adults have a secret – there are a bunch of things you're good at, a bunch of things you're average at, a bunch of things you really suck at," Levine says. "This idea of straight-A students is a perfect mythology to me. Most of us are pretty average in most ways."

'The Weasel,' the Libyan arms dealer and Israel

Bernie M. Farber

A book has been written about him. He has cavorted with Mafia bosses, terrorists, smugglers, murderers and thieves. It is even believed that he knows the final resting place of Teamsters boss Jimmy Hoffa. And why not, he used to be Hoffa's driver in the day. Marvin (The Weasel) Elkind, a petty thief, little-known pro boxer, born in Jewish Toronto, shunted through foster homes and ending up in reform school, has a story that reads like a Hollywood gangster movie.

Elkind began his career as a welterweight boxer who, if it were not for his association with mobsters and crime, might have been a contender. Elkind tells the story of one of his first fights in Miami in 1953. That evening he was scheduled to fight Rocky Castellani, a welterweight who a few years later lost a close split decision to hall of famer Sugar Ray Robinson. Just before the fight was to begin, two toughs with guns showing through their jackets

OPP detective Al (Robbie) Robinson, himself a legend within the annals of Canadian policing and ironically a man I worked with during my time at Canadian Jewish Congress. Robinson was a tough cop. When I knew him, he was tasked to deal with violent neo-Nazis and white supremacists like Wolfgang Droege, who were trying to influence Canadian youth and somewhat succeeding. For Elkind, Robinson was not just his handler, but as he explained to me, "Look, kid, Robbie and I were almost the same age, but he was like a father to me. He was one of the only people to always say after a sting, 'Marv, you did a good job.' I never really heard that before."

Ensnared in a penthouse apartment in downtown Toronto was a former Libyan diplomat turned international arms dealer, Muftah El-Abbar, who was, amongst much else, a tennis aficionado. Both Canadian and American law enforcement feared he was involved in trying to secure arms for Libyan leader Moammar Gaddafi, to be funnelled to the then Palestine Liberation Organization to be used against Israel. El-Abbar was especially interested in military-grade helicopters. He was careful; no American agent to date was able to get near him. Robinson figured if anyone could do the job it was The Weasel.

Following a briefing by Robinson, Elkind realized that El-Abbar's finances were handled by a Spanish bank in the city. As luck would have it, his estranged brother, Stanley, a successful lawyer in Toronto, was at the time on the bank's board. Even though the brothers had not spoken in years, Elkind, with his usual moxie, devised a plan.

In the 1980s, drywall was in short supply. Elkind was in touch with a Toronto builder he knew working on a large construction project in Miami. Promising him a "million dollars" in drywall, Elkind headed to El-Abbar's bank. Meeting the manager, introducing himself as Marvin Elkind, he explained he had a large business deal for drywall and would require a large loan to purchase it. The bank manager, not knowing of the brothers' estrangement, immediately contacted the builders who confirmed the upcoming business deal. Given all the circumstances, the bank was eager to proceed.

All was in place when Elkind explained that the American builder was coming into Toronto and he wanted to entertain him. The builder, he explained, was a tennis nut, and Elkind confided he knew nothing of the game. So began the scam. The bank manager unwittingly made arrangements for his client, El-Abbar, to meet Elkind's builder friend, who in the end turned out to be a U.S. Treasury agent.

The clever con that Elkind arranged led to El-Abbar's arrest and the subsequent decision it seems for the Libyan agent to work with the CIA. Interestingly, it was this sting that led to information of Gaddafi's residence, which was bombed in 1986 in retaliation for what was believed to be a Libyan-inspired terrorist attack against American servicemen in Berlin.

Elkind was a mobster and a snitch. By his own admission, he did some very bad things, much of which he tells me today he is not proud of. As the years have crept up on him, Elkind ponders his own mortality.

"You play the cards you're dealt," he explained in his casual blunt manner, "so if I could do this [stop the Libyans], I figured that maybe the Ribono Shel Olam [the master of the universe] will be a little nicer to me when my time comes."

For more information about The Weasel, read The Weasel: A Double Life in the Mob by Adrian Humphreys (John Wiley and Sons).

Bernie M. Farber is the former executive director of the Canadian Jewish Congress.

Marvin Elkind

walked in and cleared the dressing room. Then a short, elegantly dressed man walked in puffing on a cigar; it was Myer Lansky, famed American Jewish mobster.

Hob nit kain moireh (don't be afraid), Lansky said to Elkind in Yiddish and proceeded to engage him in a conversation, which led to Elkind understanding that Lansky wanted him to throw the fight in the third round. With an enticement of $1,000 (double what he would have made) and the ever-present threat of what may happen if he didn't, Elkind agreed. As he was about to leave, Lansky turned to Elkind and said wryly, "Boychik, remember, if you don't do this, just be sure you have someone around to say Kaddish."

Yet The Weasel was much more than a second-rate boxer and Mafia hanger-on. Elkind worked as a police informant for more than three decades. Whether it was the FBI, U.S. Customs and Border Protection, U.S. Department of the Treasury or our very own OPP with whom he had a longtime personal connection, Elkind betrayed mobsters, mercenaries, money launderers and many more across both Canada and the United States. However, the sting that Elkind is most proud of is the one he pulled against Libyan agents allegedly out to harm his beloved Israel.

It was 1984. Elkind had already been working with Rushing to preserve Ladino legacies

Charlotte Anthony
JTA

Isaac Azose knew he had a treasure in his hands – a nearly century-old booklet for Ladino-speaking Jews immigrating to the United States that featured English, Ladino and Yiddish expressions to help them acculturate into their new communities.

"I thought to myself, I've got a real find here," said Azose, cantor of Congregation Ezra Bessaroth in Seattle, Wash., whose family came from Turkey.

He became one of many people in Seattle to share a Ladino artifact with Devin Naar, an assistant professor in Jewish studies at the University of Washington who is trying to uncover, collect, preserve and digitize the rich heritage of Sephardi Jews.

While small collections of Ladino books and documents can be found at the Library of Congress, the American Sephardi Federation and Yeshiva University, Naar says his project, Seattle Sephardic Treasures, is the first community-based initiative to gather Ladino source materials in one place.

"More than 10,000 Yiddish books are readily accessible and digitized through the Yiddish Book Center in Amherst, Mass., but no equivalent exists for Ladino and virtually no original Ladino books can be accessed online," said Naar, whose effort is part of the larger Sephardic Studies Initiative of the University of Washington's Stroum Jewish Studies Program.

Ladino, also known as Judeo-Spanish, was the language of Sephardi Jews whose ancestors were expelled from Spain in 1492 and then settled throughout the Mediterranean basin of the Ottoman Empire.

Its Ashkenazi counterpart, Yiddish, continues to survive through haredi Orthodox communities and some secular advocates of the language.

Ladino, however, has faced a steep decline in the past century. While Yiddish has more than three million speakers worldwide, UNESCO estimates that fewer than 150,000 people still speak Ladino.

Gloria Ascher, co-director of Judaic Studies at Tufts University, offers several reasons for the language's precipitous dropoff: 90 per cent of Ladino speakers, particularly in places such as Bulgaria and Greece, were murdered during the Holocaust; with the rise of Zionism, Hebrew is emphasized as the central Jewish language; Ladino-speaking immigrant parents encourage their children to speak the native language of their new countries, such as English.

After New York and Los Angeles, Seattle has the third-largest Sephardi community in the United States. According to a 2000 study by the Jewish Federation of Seattle, there are 2,700 Sephardi households in the community's total 22,490 Jewish households.

Naar started collecting materials at Ezra Bessaroth, a Sephardi synagogue, at the annual Purim bazaar in March. He has already gathered dozens of documents, including a rare Ladino textbook published in Salonika, Greece, in 1929. He even found a set of letters from the 1930s written by a nine-year old girl from the Greek island of Rhodes to her family members in Seattle.

"She was able to correspond her way and her family's way off the island of Rhodes to evade Nazi persecution and to find safety in the United States," Naar said. "The entire story is preserved in the set of letters. It's really an amazing story."

The value of the objects should not be underestimated, says Noam Pianko, chair of the Stroum Jewish Studies Program.

"It's the stories and the past of the Sephardic Jewish community of Seattle, so it has tremendous communal value," he said. "These documents are important on a scholarly level as well. They tell an untold and yet incredibly important story of the Sephardic Jewish experience in America."

Many of the documents have been buried in basements or closets and breathe an authenticity that can never be captured in academic works.

"I want to make the materials available in their original form so you can see the handwriting, the coffee stains and the lived lives of the owners," Naar said.

Lynne Winters, director of the American Sephardi Federation, says it is remarkable that Naar has gained so many original documents.

"When you can touch something that someone's hands touched however many years ago, whether it is 20, 25 or 100 years ago, there's something unique about that [rather] than just seeing it in a book," she said. "You are touching history and making a physical connection with someone who's passed."

Naar hopes to use his effort as a pilot program to be replicated with Sephardi communities elsewhere in the United States.

"Ladino source materials, although in smaller amounts to begin with, are not easily accessible and there's been no project until now to make Ladino materials widely accessible over the Internet," he said.

Unlike Yiddish documents, which have been catalogued through the YIVO Institute for Jewish Research in New York and other archives, Ladino documents have no such home.

"I have a few Ladino books and they are in pretty rough condition, and there are not going to be anymore coming out," said Randall Belinfante, librarian and archivist at the National Sephardic Library.

"People are writing about Ladino culture, but they are not writing Ladino materials."

Lyudmila Sholokhova, the head librarian at the YIVO Institute, says there is no clear estimate of how many Ladino books still exist. However, there are an estimated 600 Ladino works at Yeshiva University, 200 more at YIVO, 200 at the Library of Congress and about 170 at the National Sephardic Library.

"Digitization will bring huge possibilities for people to get access to their heritage and also huge possibilities for libraries around the world to collaborate because at the moment, we don't have a clear idea of what other libraries have," Sholokhova said.

There is a level of interest in preserving the language. Ladino Komunita, an online Ladino forum started by Rachel Bortnick in 1999, tries to unite the Ladino-speaking community. The forum now has 1,400 people from more than 42 countries.

"The language was the rope that tied our culture together," Sholokhova said. "Without the language and without the communities that spoke the language, all we can do is to pick up the pieces and rescue them from oblivion – the food, the sayings, the customs related to our Jewishness in the Sephardic form."

Azose is hoping that Naar's effort will have an impact not just on scholars but on today's descendants of Ladino speakers.

"I think the younger generation will take more of an interest than the current generation," he said. "They will want to know more about their history and where they came from, and their parents may not be able to answer those questions for them – but this will."

The following is a review of the news highlights of the Jewish year 5772.

September 2011

- An Egyptian mob breaks into the Israeli Embassy in Cairo, and Israeli personnel are stuck inside for hours until Egyptian commandos arrive at the scene. Israeli Air Force jets evacuate the Israelis from the country. The attack exacerbates fears in Israel that it is losing a once-reliable ally to the south.

- The Palestinians submit their bid for statehood recognition to the UN Security Council. In speeches at the UN General Assembly, President Barack Obama rejects the Palestinians' unilateral approach, saying that Israel's security concerns are legitimate and must be addressed.

In dueling speeches in the same forum, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin

The Jewish World

Netanyahu and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas trade charges of ethnic cleansing.

- Turkey expels Israel's ambassador to the country and downgrades diplomatic and military ties.

- Some 15 countries announce before the Durban Review Conference known as Durban III that they will boycott the proceedings. The one-day session receives little attention amid all the goings-on at the United Nations.

October

- Turkey agrees to accept Israel's help after initially rejecting assistance during an earthquake there that kills 430 people and injures 1,000.

- The terrorist organization Hamas releases Israeli soldier Gilad Shalit after the Israeli cabinet approves a deal in exchange for more than 1,000 Palestinian prisoners. Cheering crowds greet Shalit when he finally returns to his family home in Mitzpe Hila after five years in captivity. Less than a week after the Shalit deal, Egypt agrees to release American-Israeli Ilan Gropel in exchange for 25

Gilad Shalit and his father, Noam, embrace

Egyptians and he reunites with his mother.

- The United States stops paying its dues to UNESCO following the UN cultural and scientific agency's vote to grant full membership to the Palestinians. A month later, UNESCO calls for emergency donations because of the loss of U.S. funding. Israel also cuts tax payments to the Palestinian Authority.

- The New York Times reports that President Obama is considering granting clemency to convicted Israeli spy Jonathan Pollard, but Vice President Joe Biden objects, telling the president that Pollard would be released "over my dead body." Biden subsequently agrees to meet with Jewish leaders to press the case for Pollard, a U.S. Navy civilian analyst who was convicted in 1987 and has been serving life sentence in a federal prison.

Nobel prizes awarded

- Five Jewish scientists win 2011 Nobel Prizes: Israeli professor Daniel Shechtman, chemistry; University of California physicist Saul Perlmutter, physics, with Johns Hopkins astronomer Adam Riess; and immunologists Ralph Steinman and Bruce Beutler, medicine.

- A protest encampment in lower Manhattan takes on an increasingly Jewish flavour as services are organized for Yom Kippur and a sukkah is installed for the holiday of Sukkot. Critics charge that the so-called Occupy movement, motivated largely by anger over corporate greed and income inequality, has antisemitic and anti-Zionist undertones – charges that are vigorously disputed by Jewish participants in the protests.

- Former Beatle Paul McCartney marries American Jewish heiress Nancy Shevell in London, the day after the couple attend Yom Kippur services at a British synagogue. McCartney's former wife, Linda Eastman, also was Jewish; she died in 1998.

November

- French President Nicolas Sarkozy calls Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu a "liar" in a private exchange with President Obama during a summit meeting. Obama responds by saying, "You may be sick of him, but me, I have to deal with him every day." Sarkozy subsequently meets with French Jewish leaders in an effort to make amends.

- Evelyn Lauder, pioneer of the pink ribbon as a symbol of breast cancer awareness, dies. Lauder, the wife of cosmetics heir Leonard Lauder and mother of Jewish leader Ronald Lauder, was diagnosed with breast cancer in 1989 and founded the Breast Cancer Research Foundation, which raised $350 million to fight the disease.

December

- Christopher Hitchens, the iconoclastic author, journalist and prominent atheist, dies after a lengthy battle with cancer. Hitchens discovered as an adult that his maternal grandmother was Jewish.

Na'ama Margolis

- Thousands rally in the Israeli city of Beit Shemesh following a report that 8-year-old Na'ama Margolis was spat on by haredi Orthodox extremists on her way to school for supposedly wearing immodest dress. The incident sets off a broad campaign to rein in religious extremism in Israel. Haredi rioters remove signs calling for the separation of sexes on city streets and clash with police.

- Israel releases 550 Palestinians prisoners in the second stage of the prisoner swap for captured soldier Gilad Shalit.

January 2012

- The Government of Canada strengthened its sanctions against the Iranian regime. The new measures focused on front companies used by the regime to avoid existing sanctions, freezing assets and prohibiting dealings with key entities involved with Iran's violations of international law.

- Former Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert pleads not guilty to corruption charges after being indicted for allegedly accepting hundreds of thousands of dollars in bribes during the construction of the Holyland apartment project when he was mayor of Jerusalem and later Israel's trade minister. In July, following his acquittal, he says he will not return to politics.
- Aryeh Ralbag, the chief rabbi of Amsterdam, is suspended from his post after signing a document on "curing" homosexuality. Ralbag is later reinstated, saying he was wrong to use his Amsterdam title and that the document did not fully reflect his position on the matter.
- The owner of the Atlanta Jewish Times finds himself under fire after penning a column speculating that Israel might assassinate President Obama. Andrew Adler apologizes and, within days, resigns his post.

February

- Rabbi Gunther Plaut, the author of a commentary on the Torah that has become the standard text in Reform congregations, dies at 99.
- Anne Frank and Jewish journalist Daniel Pearl are discovered to have been posthumously baptized by members of the Mormon Church. The controversial practice has long irked some Jews, who find it an insult to the memory of departed relatives. Church leaders respond with measures to eliminate "unauthorized" baptisms.
- A car bomb attack in the Indian capital of New Delhi injures the wife of an Israeli diplomat. Indian police arrest a journalist in connection with the attack who reportedly had ties to Iran. India also announces it has discovered evidence linking the attack to attempted strikes on Israeli targets in Thailand and the republic of Georgia.
- French Jewish director Michel Hazanavicius wins an Academy Award for his film The Artist, while Woody Allen takes home the Oscar for best original screenplay for Midnight in Paris at the 84th Academy Awards ceremony in Los Angeles. Israel's hopes for a statuette are dashed again when its entry for best foreign film, Footnote, loses to the Iranian film A Separation.

March

- Canada's Parliament passed Bill C-10, which empowers Canadian victims of terrorism and their families to launch civil suits against states, organizations and individuals that sponsor terrorism. This legislation was the result of a long campaign by a dedicated grassroots coalition of Canadians, under the leadership of the Canadian Coalition Against Terror.
- President Obama tells the annual gathering of the American Israel Public Affairs Committee that there is still time to use diplomatic means to prevent an Iranian nuclear weapon. Obama adds that the military option remains on the table.
- In a New York Times op-ed, journalist Peter Beinart calls for a boycott of Israeli goods produced in the West Bank, or what he calls "undemocratic Israel." Beinart, the author of The Crisis of Zionism, launches a bitter debate while coming under withering criticism for his proposal despite repeated assertions that he loves Israel and was acting in the country's best interest.

- A gunman on a motorcycle opens fire on a Jewish school in Toulouse, France, killing four people: Rabbi Jonathan Sandler, his two young sons, and the young daughter of the school's principal. The shooter, Mohammed Merah, later dies in a standoff with French police. The massacre shocks the French community and thousands march in memory. Two months later, three Jews are attacked in southeast France, and a report by the French Jewish community's protection service comes out saying that the massacre encouraged more French antisemitic attacks.

April

- The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs and the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg teamed up with the Norway House Cree Nation to conduct a leadership development mission of 30 First Nations youth to Israel. Chief Ron Evans, who intends to make the trip an annual event, spoke of Israel as a source of inspiration for his community. "The Jewish people are the historic, indigenous people of Israel," said

Evans. "For Canada's First Nations, Israel's story demonstrates how an ancient people can maintain their heritage while embracing the modern world – and in so doing, achieve self-determination."

- Mike Wallace, the veteran correspondent for the CBS news program 60 Minutes, dies at 93. Wallace was born Myron Leon Wallace to Russian Jewish parents who had shortened their name from Wallechinsky.

• Ben Zion Netanyahu, a noted historian and the father of Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, dies at 102. Netanyahu was an expert on the history of Spanish Jewry. His hawkish views were said to have a significant influence on his son's policies.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut

May

- Netanyahu forms a broad unity government with the Kadima Party, avoiding the prospect of early elections. The new coalition includes 94 lawmakers, the largest governing coalition Israel has had since 1984.

• Celebrity hairstylist Vidal Sassoon dies at 84. Sassoon, who grew up in a Jewish orphanage and fought in Israel's War of Independence, established a global network of hair salons and was committed to fighting antisemitism.

- A sell-out crowd of 40,000 haredi Orthodox Jewish men gather at a New York City baseball stadium to hear rabbinical leaders decry the corrosive impact of the Internet. In speeches in English and Yiddish, the rabbis from haredi communities describe the Internet as impure, a threat to modesty and a distraction from Torah study.

• Maurice Sendak, author of the beloved children's book Where the Wild Things Are, dies at 83. The son of immigrant Polish Jews, Sendak had said that he spent his childhood thinking about the children who died in the Holocaust in Europe. "My burden is living for those who didn't," he told The Associated Press.

- Israeli Deputy Foreign Minister Danny Ayalon and widows of the murdered athletes and coaches at the 1972 Munich Olympics launch a one-minute video campaign after the International Olympic Committee officially rejects a request to hold a moment of silence for the Munich 11 at the London Games this summer.
- President Obama awards the Medal of Freedom to Jan Karski, Madeleine Albright and Bob Dylan, all Jewish, among other recipients.
- Israeli protesters attack Africans and smash windshields at an anti-migrant demonstration in Tel Aviv and a week later, violent demonstrations continue. U.S. Jewish groups condemn anti-African violence and the riots, which end with 17 arrests.
- After the ouster of President Hosni Mubarak during an uprising more than a year ago, Egypt holds the first round of voting in the presidential election. Mohamed Morsi of the Islamist Muslim Brotherhood goes on to win the presidency.

June

- Canada and Israel signed an energy cooperation agreement aimed at strengthening ties between the Canadian sector and Israel's burgeoning energy industry. The agreement, which includes a focus on environmental best practices and unconventional energy sources, will provide Israelis with greater access to Canada's world-class expertise in natural resource management.
- Toronto's Judy Feld Carr was awarded the Presidential Award of Distinction by Israeli President Shimon Peres for her successful, decades-long campaign to rescue the Jews of Syria. Feld Carr, who also dedicated years of service to Beth Tzedec Synagogue and the Canadian Jewish Congress, is credited with enabling more than 3,200 Jews to leave Syria.
- A New York Times report confirms long-held suspicions that Israel and the United States collaborated to develop a computer virus to derail Iran's nuclear ambitions. The Stuxnet virus was jointly developed by the Israeli military and the U.S. National Security Agency, according to the Times.
- Israeli President Shimon Peres calls for the renewal of peace talks with the Palestinians after being awarded the U.S. Presidential Medal of Freedom. President Obama says Peres embodies Israel's need to simultaneously defend itself and to seek peace.

July

- Israelis protesting the absence of affordable housing and the high cost of living in Israel, stage massive demonstrations. Moshe Silman, a protester who had set himself on fire during a rally in Tel Aviv while blaming the State of Israel for leaving him homeless and helpless, dies several days later from second- and third-degree burns.
- A draft committee formulates a new law on haredi Orthodox military service. Netanyahu later disbands the committee, and its draft law is rejected by Israel's Knesset. In August, Israel starts drafting haredim into the army.
- Israel brings in remaining Ethiopian immigrants and builds a new absorption centre in southern Israel.
- The International Olympic Committee rejects an international call for a moment of silence at the opening ceremonies of the London Olympics for the 11 Israeli athletes and coaches killed by Palestinian terrorists at the 1972 Games.
- Veteran CTV sports commentator Brian Williams made Canadians proud during the opening ceremonies of the London Olympics, after offering a passionate condemnation of the International Olympic Committee's decision to refuse a moment of silence in memory of the Munich massacre. Said Williams: "And as Israel prepares, my position is well known and it is one that I have taken in previous Olympics. It is wrong that the IOC refuses to have a minute's silence for the Israeli athletes that were slaughtered in Munich. Dr. Rogge says the ceremony is not the place to remember a tragic event, but it's one of the most significant and world-changing events in Olympic history. It absolutely should have been done here."
- A terrorist attack in Bulgaria kills five and wounds 33 Israeli tourists; Netanyahu says all signs point to Iran as the culprit.
- Rabbi Yosef Shalom Elyashiv, considered the most important authority of Jewish law for the non-chassidic haredi Orthodox community, dies at 102.
- Germany's government calls for circumcision law after a district court in Cologne rules that the non-medical circumcision of a minor is a criminal act.
- Yitzhak Shamir, former Israeli prime minister, dies at 96. Israel's leaders praise Shamir's dedication and service.

In the path of Sefarad

Geoff Gans
Special to the CJN

Understanding how the past works on the present isn't just for historians, junk raiders and therapists. It can be important to anyone with a family history of immigration, helping us appreciate who we are today, and possibly even gain perspective on the future.

Ever since our first date, I've been intrigued by my fiancée's Jewish past. Unlike my own eastern European antecedents, Robyn's forebears on her mother's side came to Canada from the exotic lands of North Africa.

So it made sense, planning our first trip together overseas, to include Tangiers, the Moroccan city from where her mom, Esther, had emigrated in 1958. Unfortunately, it was not to be. This was April 2011 and with the Arab Spring in full bloom and news of a bombing at a popular tourist spot in Marrakesh, we decided not to go to Morocco. Instead, we opted for seventeen days in Spain, known in the Bible as Sefarad, and settled by Jews over two millennia ago.

We started in Madrid. Walking around on our second morning we came across Casa Sefarad Israel, a cultural centre with offices and exhibition space, part of an organization founded in 2006 as an official bridge between Spain and the Jewish world. I considered the chance encounter a sign we were on the right track.

Entering, we were greeted by a sleepy security guard who showed us to the featured exhibit of Argentine poet Alexandra Pizarnik. This exhibit, and Pizarnik's life, would offer me the first in a series of insights into the larger story of Jewish movement, or what I pictured as an endless entanglement of ropes tying past to present.

Born in Argentina in 1936 to Russian immigrant parents, Pizarnik was raised in a suburb of Buenos Aires and would go on to make a significant contribution to the post-war literary scene in Paris. As a poet, she was well-regarded and ahead of her time. Beyond her work, the Pizarnik exhibit spoke to the distances that would come to define the poet's life and the crossing lines of geography that made up Jewish identity at the time. Fittingly, her first book of poems was titled La tierra más ajena ("The land far beyond").

For us, the next stop was Cadiz in the deep south of Spain, the most ancient city still standing in western Europe. Founded by the Phoenicians as a walled outpost in 1104 BCE, today, Cadiz is a quiet Andalusian port town. On Sundays, residents gather along the expansive coastline in clusters – tanning, smoking and eating popsicles.

Also interesting about Cadiz is its proximity to Morocco and Portugal. It is believed that after being expelled from Spain in 1492, Sephardim from the bottom half of the country went west to Portugal, only to be expelled once again a hundred years later. It was at that time that they moved south to Morocco via the waters of Cadiz.

As a nine-year-old aboard a boat to Canada, Esther would have taken the opposite route, stopping in Portugal before crossing the Atlantic and arriving in Halifax. That Sunday in Cadiz, sitting on the pier, I imagined what it might have felt like for her, her parents and their ancestors, staring out at the blurred horizon and the promise of a new life ahead.

Discovering Spain's Jewish past

For our last stop in search of our Sephardic past, Robyn and I visited the Museum of Jewish History in Girona, a picturesque university town in the state of Catalonia. For a four-euro entrance fee, the museum offers a wide-ranging collection of facts, fashions and fixtures of Spain's Jewish history.

Most impressive about the museum, however, was the building's location adjacent to the site of the calle, or high street. In the 11th and 12th centuries, this was the exact locale of the original Jewish quarter, home to many great scholars including Nachmanides, who spent most of his life in Girona.

The view of the street from the museum's second-floor window is nothing special: a stone slab staircase, overgrown by weeds and moss. But the memory that lies beneath its surface is significant: a place where Jewish culture flourished, where one of the principal Kabbalistic schools in Europe was established, and where, ultimately, in the fifteenth century, a ghetto formed in the decades leading up to the Spanish decree.

Today, the street is closed off from the rest of the city. However, to museum visitors, it offers more than simply a view of a forgotten laneway: it offers proof of the past.

In much the same way that a dead relative's passport recalls the path of a family's movement, the calle in Girona stands as evidence of a vanished community. And you don't have to be a miner of history to recognize the significance of this.

Beyond the galleries, eateries and siestas marking our trip, following in the path of Sefarad was a way of honouring the Sephardic roots of Robyn's family. One day, I hope to do the same for Svencionis, Bobruysk, and the various places of my own ancestors' past.

It is only by visiting the physical settings of history that we can see clearly the space that lies between our lives and those who came before us.

(Geoff Gans lives in Toronto's Little Portugal neighbourhood.)

Iranian Jewry Today

Shai Secunda
Jewish Ideas Daily/JTA

In late June 2012, Mohammad-Reza Rahimi, the vice-president of the Islamic Republic of Iran, addressed an international conference on the proliferation of illicit drugs. In describing Iran's narcotics problem, Rahimi acknowledged his country's extensive border with Afghanistan, the largest producer of illegal opium in the world. But he also blamed the crisis on the Babylonian Talmud.

Rahimi parroted old antisemitic screeds about the Talmud preaching Jewish superiority and claimed that it "teaches [Jews] how to destroy non-Jews." Given the alleged absence of "Zionist" addicts from the world – apparently Rahimi is unaware of Israel's documented heroin problem – the vice-president took the presence of Jews in the international drug trade as an indication of the Talmud's evil influence.

The New York Times and several major western media outlets published Rahimi's antisemitic remarks and suggested that the affair further increased Iran's growing isolation and intensified the nuclear crisis unfolding between Israel, Iran, and the United States. But the media largely neglected to consider how such remarks affected, and were received by, Iran's own Jewish community. Indeed, the broader discourse concerning the current Iranian nuclear crisis has focused solely on Jews living in Israel. Iranian Jews are simply not mentioned.

Numbering approximately 30,000, Iranian Jewry constitutes the largest Jewish community in the Middle East outside of Israel. Very soon after Rahimi's speech, the website of the Tehran Jewish Association posted a letter that its director, Homayun Sameyah, had dispatched to the Iranian vice-president. In it, Sameyah takes issue with Rahimi's allegations against the Talmud, and argues that "besides discussing matters of religious law, [the Talmud] also describes the lives of the sages and prophets, aspects of proper morals and behaviour, and matters of health and medicine, within the limits of that time's science." The letter respectfully but firmly requests that the vice-president clarify his remarks and correct any potential misunderstandings which they may have brought about. Finally, it asks that Rahimi reiterate the difference between Zionists and Jews – a distinction that originated with Ayatollah Khomeini in 1979, when the Jewish community sought assurances that it would be safe in the new republic.

Sameyah's letter of protest, along with other official statements, articles, and announcements uploaded to the Tehran Jewish Association's website, provide a fascinating viewing-point into the Jewish community in Iran today. But like most sources of information on the Jews in the Islamic Republic – including western journalism and even scholarly publications – the view is more peephole than window, and it allows for only a limited and frequently obstructed glimpse at the complexities of this fascinating community.

Jews constitute the oldest minority in the Islamic Republic today by a long shot. The community has an ancient and illustrious history in Iran, dating back to the Babylonian exile in the middle of the first millennium BCE when Jews found themselves under the mostly benevolent rule of the nascent yet soon vast Iranian Achaemenid Empire, founded by Cyrus. Aside from sporadic episodes of persecution, Jews prospered under the various dynasties that ruled Iran. But that changed when the Safavids came to power at the turn of the 16th century and inaugurated Shiite Islam as the state religion. Iranian minorities of all stripes did not fare well under Shiite Islam, particularly in its medieval articulation. The longstanding Shiite persecution complex coupled with newfound hegemony over vast territories often proved a dangerous cocktail, while severe purity laws precluded most forms of contact between Shiite Iranians and everyone else.

By the close of the Qajar period (1786-1925), the Jewish population was seriously depleted. Yet the modernization of Iran and particularly the Constitutional Revolution of 1906-1911, which gave parliamentary representation to Jews and other recognized minorities, finally brought a measure of relief. The ascension of the Pahlavi monarchy (1925-1979) improved the situation for the Jews quite dramatically. As a result of this brief upturn in Jewish fortunes, the Islamic Revolution of 1979 is often seen as a radical deterioration for Iranian Jews. Indeed, many Iranian Jews now living outside of Iran's borders still pine for the autocratic reign of Mohammad Reza Shah Pahlavi (1941-79), over 30 years on.

Unquestionably, the numbers confirm a major decline. Within a decade of the Islamic Revolution, the community had dwindled by some 75 per cent. The popular persecution that followed the revolution, and the difficult years of the Iran-Iraq war made life in the new republic unbearable for much of the Jewish community. Numerous Jews, other minority groups, as well as many liberal-thinking Muslims, packed up their things and escaped. The mass exodus and the stories that Iranian Jews brought with them have to a great extent defined the public perception of what it means to live as a Jew in Iran. Yet, in the years since many of those Jews departed, various political changes have significantly affected Iran's remaining Jews. The Iran-Iraq war, the years of reform at the turn of the millennium, and now the complexities of Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's presidency and the ever-mutating Iranian political scene have successively altered the map dramatically.

In February and March of 2009, New York Times columnist Roger Cohen penned a pair of now infamous articles about a trip he took to the Islamic Republic. The image that Cohen painted of Jewish life in Iran was particularly rosy. He observed that furious protests against Israel's war with Gaza did not spill over into antisemitic diatribes and, more personally, that he had "seldom been treated with such consistent warmth as in Iran." The response from many journalists around the country was swift and severe. Their resounding message was that Cohen did not know how to read Iran and its Jews. He had been duped.

In certain respects, the fault lines highlighted by the Cohen fiasco parallel the dispute between Israeli scholars of Iran. On one side, a number of academics, mainly affiliated with major Israeli centres for Middle Eastern studies, are closely aligned with the government's approach regarding the Iranian nuclear threat. Many also see the situation of Iranian Jewry as particularly dire.

On the other, scholars associated primarily with the left, such as Ben-Gurion University's Haggai Ram, criticize the government's view, and offer radical and even subversive re-readings of the current crisis, which suggest that Israel's fear of Iran is largely self-manufactured. Recent work by Orly Rahimiyan – an extensively published doctoral candidate also at Ben-Gurion – makes the case for a more nuanced assessment of the ethno-national identity and political situation of the Jews in Iran today. Rahimiyan argues that Iranian Jews have constructed a complex hybrid identity for themselves that cannot easily be untangled. In this regard, Iranian Jews are very much Iranian, although they are also strongly Jewish.

Following years of secularization during the reign of the Shah, Jews in the Islamic Republic became visibly more religious. (This might be attributed to the general religious fervour that the country has experienced since the late 1970s. Alternatively, it might be related to the fact that the synagogue is one of the few public communal spaces still available for Jews.) In practice, Iranian Jews can visit Israel via a third country. Receiving an exit visa is no longer the bureaucratic nightmare it once was, and technically speaking, many Iranian Jews could leave the country if they so desired. In the summer of 2007, what began as a genuinely felt offer of financial incentives to Jewish Iranians who wanted to immigrate to Israel turned into a debacle that deeply insulted Iran's Jewish community.

Many outside observers attribute Iranian Jewry's frequent criticisms of Israel's treatment of the Palestinians solely to

Mohammed-Reza Rahimi

Tehran Jewish Association website). While this episode reflects the highly negative influence that official Iranian rhetoric has had on the Jewish community there, it also reveals a community confident enough to register its complaint in full view.

Roger Cohen wrote his Times articles just months before the massive, unprecedented unrest of the summer and fall of 2009 that came to be known as the Green Movement. The protests, which erupted in the wake of a stolen presidential re-election and which the regime and its civilian minions violently suppressed, alerted the world to a republic that was far less stable than previously thought and to a new generation of Iranians no longer willing to be trampled. Where the Jews stood during this tumultuous period is unclear. The status of most religious minorities was simply not part of the reformist discourse. Still, one cannot help but notice the letter of congratulation to Ahmadinejad on his 2005 election which appears on the Tehran Jewish Association's website, and the virtual silence that followed his 2009 re-election.

Early analysis of the Green Movement saw the protests not as revolutionary, but as a civil rights movement that wanted a fair vote. But three years later, following a dramatic Arab Spring, some of the young Iranians who were involved in the movement have come to the realization that their efforts to effect change within the system led only to beatings and humiliations. Despondency reigns. The Islamic Revolution wrought by their parents does not speak to them, nor does it define their identity—even for some of those who are deeply Muslim. A burgeoning underground music and radical arts scene reflects a generation in the throes of the painful process of crafting a new Iranian identity. Thus, despite the appearance of order, the situation remains ripe for change.

A number of western analysts and Iranian expats continue to hope for the return of the Pahlavi monarchy, yet all indications suggest that there is virtually no chance of this happening. A true revolution, if it is to come at all, will take place organically, and may very well emerge from a newly formed Iranian identity. The precise nature of this identity is anyone's guess. Some evidence suggests that Zoroastrianism – the ancient religion of Iran – may play a role, though now in a de-ritualized, nationalistic form. To an extent, the Shah went down this path already, and used it to push a unified secular Iranian national identity that partially effaced minority identities. This time around, however, maybe we will see a pan-Iranian Islamic-Zoroastrian hybrid that allows space for the country's many minority groups, including Jews and Christians. Perhaps even something similar to the vibrantly diverse ethno-religious realities reflected in the pages of the Babylonian Talmud. If only Vice-President Rahimi had bothered to open it.

efforts to appease the Islamic regime. But as disconcerting as the thought may be, it is possible that the critique springs from the widely held Iranian view of the Jewish state, which sees Israel's rule over the Palestinians through the lens of Iran's traumatic encounters with colonialism and related western attempts to intervene in its political affairs.

Nonetheless, there are reasons to be concerned about Iranian Jewry. Contrary to Cohen's observations, not every official parses the difference between Zionist and Jew as neatly as the Jewish community would want him to. In a famous case, just before Passover in 1999, 13 Iranian Jews were incarcerated in the city of Shiraz on suspicion of spying for Israel (three were later released but the rest were deemed guilty). And beyond his remarks about the annihilation of Israel, President Ahmadinejad's Holocaust denial has made the community extremely uncomfortable. So uncomfortable, in fact, that in early 2006 the Jewish community sent a letter of protest to the president (the letter, which unlike the dispatch to Rahimi did not merit an official response, is also uploaded to the

Obama-Netanyahu meeting

Now would be a good time

David Horowitz
The Times of Israel

The Iranians must be laughing all the way to the bomb.

Israel and the United States, instead of working shoulder to shoulder to thwart Tehran's nuclear drive, with the clearest understandings on what would necessitate a resort to the last option of a military strike, are diverting their focus to each other's ostensible failings.

The regime in Tehran is territorially rapacious and ideologically extreme. Quite apart from bidding for a bomb, it is guilty of the relentless mistreatment of its own people and of inciting genocide against Israel. However, rather than concentrating on exposing Iran's reprehensible actions to international scrutiny, and thereby bolstering support for whatever action may be necessary to curb the regime's nuclear ambitions, American and Israeli leaders currently spend their days trading mutual recriminations. Rather than discrediting Iran, they are discrediting each other.

The American low came on Aug. 30, when the chairman of the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff, Gen. Martin Dempsey, pronounced that he would not wish to be "complicit" in an Israeli resort to force against Iran's nuclear facilities. Dempsey could have used neutral language to indicate his dismay at talk of an Israeli military intervention that he regards as unwarranted. He could have said he would not want to be "part" of such an action, or "a partner" in it, or "party" to it, or any number of other formulations.

But he chose - and officials of Dempsey's stature, in jobs of such acute sensitivity, do not employ loaded, emotive language by accident - to use "complicit," a word that carries connotations of criminality and illegality. America's top soldier, that is, opted not to highlight the illegality of an ongoing program by a murderously irresponsible regime to obtain the most destructive weapon known to mankind. Rather, he reserved his characterization of illegality for a potentially desperate, high-risk, courageous Israeli effort to thwart that program.

Fire Guts Kollel

VANCOUVER — A Vancouver kollel will be closed for at least two months after a fire ripped through it Aug. 20. The two-alarm blaze at Ohel Ya'akov Community Kollel broke out just before 1 a.m. It's unclear if it started in the kollel or a kosher restaurant downstairs, where a cleaner noticed smoke and flames. Damage to the space was extensive, but no one was hurt, and books and sifrei Torah were undamaged. The cause of the fire is unknown, but fire officials saw no obvious sign of arson, kollel director Rabbi Shmuel Yeshayahu told the Jewish Independent.

50th UJA Campaign

CALGARY — Calgary's United Jewish Appeal launched its 50th-anniversary campaign Sept. 4. The 2011 campaign raised $2.85 million from 1,625 contributors—including 287 new donors—but funding requests for this year total $3.2 million, the city's Jewish Free Press reported. "With 100 per cent participation, we can raise that amount," campaign co-chair Micah Libin told the paper.

WORLD

Asset Heirs Sought

TEL AVIV — A non-profit entity set up by the Israeli government is launching a campaign to find the North American heirs of Holocaust victims entitled to unclaimed assets. The Hashava Company, which was set up by a 2006 law, is seeking to find the heirs of more than 60,000 unclaimed assets held in Israel in an effort that began last week. Thousands of Jews across Europe invested in prestate Israel prior to World War II, and those investments have continued to grow. Hashava — Hebrew for restitution — is responsible for finding heirs to the investments and has set up an online database allowing people to search for family names. The campaign, scheduled to last until mid-November, includes adver-

Lawsuit Planned Over Bris Ritual

NEW YORK — Agudath Israel of America is reportedly planning to sue New York City after its health department passed a law requiring written parental consent for the metzitzah b'peh circumcision ritual.

The New York Jewish Week reported on the move based on a forwarded email from the account of Agudath's general counsel. The email said the haredi group is seeking a law firm that would work for free or for "a reduced rate" to bring the lawsuit.

The city passed a measure last week requiring parents to sign off before the direct oral suction procedure is performed. It isn't used in most Jewish circumcisions, but many haredim still adhere to it. Haredi leaders have resisted calls to use alternatives.

The health department vote culminated a year of debate about the practice, sparked by the death of an infant last September and the subsequent revelation that the mohel who performed the ritual on the infant had tested positive for herpes.

A statement by the Orthodox Rabbinical Council of America (RCA) last week noted that "many Jewish legal authorities have ruled that direct oral suction is not an integral part of the circumcision ritual and advocate the use of a sterile tube to preclude any risk of infection." Like Agudath, however, the RCA expressed opposition to the New York City measure, citing "concern about government regulation of religious practices."

ZOA Loses Status

WASHINGTON — The Zionist Organization of America lost its tax exempt status after not filing returns for three consecutive years, the Forward reported. President Morton Klein said the ZOA hasn't been tax-exempt since March. Since then, he said, it filed returns and hopes to be reinstated by the end of 2012. He said the ZOA sought extensions for the three years because a school in Israel run under its auspices wasn't providing correct data, and the ZOA wanted to clarify the matter, but missed an extension deadline.

New consul general an expert in anti-BDS tactics

DJ Schneeweiss

Wants to help Canadians better understand Israel

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Israel's new consul general to Toronto and Western Canada says he wants to pick up where his predecessors left off in helping Canadians connect with Israel.

DJ Schneeweiss assumed his post in August and has spent the last month learning about Canada's Jewish and Israeli communities as he prepares to assert his vision on how best to make Israel relevant to Canadians.

Like his predecessor, Amir Gissin, Schneeweiss, 47, brings youthful energy to his role and comes equipped with a broad background in hasbarah, specifically on the file of the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement.

"I am absolutely here to continue the work my predecessors started and help Canadians understand Israel," he told The C/JN at the consulate last week in one of his first interviews as consul general.

Prior to his new role, Schneeweiss spent several years as the Israeli foreign ministry's primary tactician on all things BDS, travelling the world to fight the delegitimization campaign being waged against Israel. Before that, he was the country's deputy ambassador to China.

Born in Australia, Schneeweiss grew up "very involved" in the Jewish community there before eventually making aliyah at 22 and joining Israel's foreign service.

Although it's early days in his new role in his new city, he said he hopes to help both the Jewish and non-Jewish communities of Canada better understand contemporary Israel.

"The conversation about Israel can't only be about what's important to Israelis. It has to also be about what's important to Canadian Jews," he said. "We want the discussion of Israel to be an inclusive one. That's where I'd like to take [my role]."

He said one of his goals is to make people more aware of the "ordinary humanity" of Israel.

"When you promote the real Israel, it builds ties [to other communities] while ensuring the hostile agenda of anti-Zionists has less entry points than it normally would" to those who are less knowledgeable about the Jewish state.

However, the dialogue with others about Israel must be ongoing, and he knows it will "take a lot of effort by both the [Jewish] community and the consulate to get it into the Canadian bloodstream," he said.

In May, The CJN interviewed Ben Erel, Dana Merzel and Omer Shafir, three young Israeli idealists who are working to "build" Jerusalem ("Idealists rebuild Jerusalem," CJN, June 14). They are involved in a unique program called Building Community, under the joint auspices of The Jerusalem Fund and city hall, in what we described as "the close and cluttered neighbourhood of Kiryat Hayovel." It is primarily an impoverished, down-on-its-luck neighbourhood where thousands of people from diverse backgrounds live clustered and crowded lives.

Merzel and Shafir worked out of a community centre on Stern Street, one of the city's most notorious redoubts of street toughs and neglected byways.

In typically energetic and youthfully positive manner, they described their mission as trying to "build the human tissue" of the neighbourhood. They are determined to "foster among the residents a sense of confidence and belief in their own skills and abilities, planting in them the notion of interconnectedness among all the residents of the neighbourhood, strengthening the sense of common interests and a shared future."

It was therefore a very heartwarming pre-Rosh Hashanah message that The CJN received from Shafir, in which he updated the paper on the completion of a recent project in the neighbourhood.

Shafir was walking along the pleasant walking path on the edge of Stern Park in the furthestmost, lower part of the street when he happened upon a grimy, garbage-laden, neglected portion of the park.

Out of the corner of his eye, however, he saw evidence that someone had been trying to beat back the tide of the rising garbage, trying to care for what was then entirely neglected.

A Jerusalem update

"Ah. There is potential here," he thought to himself. "There is someone here with whom we can work."

With a bit of luck and blessing, Shafir found that someone, a humble, low-profile resident of the neighbourhood. Together, they were able to recruit other local residents. Shafir also managed to scrounge some expert advisors and resources from city hall. In just a short time, he and the humble resident had managed to assemble a volunteer team of neighbourhood residents – old and young, children and grandchildren – to fix what was broken. They succeeded in creating the Stern Garden of the Stern

Park on Stern Street in Kiryat Hayovel.

Inset is a photo showing a resident and his daughter working on the garden and a photo of the garden, complete with irrigation tubes, terraced stones for water-gathering, plants and trees.

Building the garden, Shafir wrote, was but a means toward the larger goal of helping to "build" the lives of the people who live in the neighbourhood.

The garden epitomizes the new, creative, positive beginnings we all hope for at this time of year.

Rabbi Abraham Feder, former spiritual leader of Beth Tikvah Synagogue in Toronto, has written a children's fable that tells of the heroism and unique strength of character of a young Israeli youth, Tzaki. The book is called Tzaki and His Holiday Miracles and published by Mosaica Press Inc. It is a fable told in three parts.

Each part tells a new Tzaki adventure in which the young, daring lad responds to the "cry of help" from soldiers in distress. And each adventure is anchored in the traditions and flavours of a specific holiday. A flying sukka is central to the magic and mystery of the situations in which Tzaki becomes embroiled. The stories combine endearing instruction about the Jewish holidays, soaring, fairy-tale quality imagination and identification with the Jewish state.

According to Rabbi Feder, the genesis for the stories was in an encounter with his cousins in Rishon LeZion many years ago when he met a "pre-cocious little boy named Yitzhak whom everybody called Tzaki.... It occurred to me that telling stories about the adventures of this young Israeli Jew would help bring everyone emotionally closer to the trials of our brothers and sisters in Israel."

Tzaki and His Holiday Miracles helps to instill in an age-appropriate manner for preteen readers a sense of being Jewish and a sense of belonging to a Jewish people.

Edited by Tzipora Ne'eman and lushly illustrated by Lisa Cain, the book is available on Amazon.com and at bookstores.

Toronto asked to beef up discrimination policy

Move prompted by anti-Israel group's participation in Pride Parade

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

The City of Toronto's executive committee has asked the city manager to strengthen its anti-discrimination policy in the wake of anti-Israel messaging at this summer's Pride parade.

At its Sept. 10 meeting, the committee heard from various citizens and Jewish groups who want to beef up the policy in order to hold parade organizers more accountable for the groups they allow to take part each year.

The move came in response to the participation of Queers Against Israeli Apartheid (QuAIA) in the 2012 parade. The controversial group sat out the 2011 event after threats by the city to revoke nearly $124,000 in funding to Pride if it marched.

QuAIA's presence at Pride has been denounced by Jewish and pro-Israel organizations since the group first started participating in them four years ago.

After its meeting, the committee issued a four-fold directive to city manager Joe Pennachetti to revise the city's declaration of compliance to include anti-discriminatory city policies that go beyond provincial and federal statutes and legislation; report back on amendments to the city's anti-discrimination policy; report on amendments to the city's grants policy, and consider banning the term "Israeli apartheid" from Pride events as a condition for the city funding 2013 Pride Week.

The last point was tabled in a motion by Ward 10 Councillor James Pasternak.

Pennachetti has until April to report back to council.

Representatives from the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), B'nai Brith Canada and Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center (FSWC) all asked the city to strengthen its anti-discrimination policy.

In 2011, Toronto city council ordered Pennachetti to consider whether QuAIA's messaging violated the policy and to rewrite it to ban the term "Israeli apartheid" from city-funded programs.

But Pennachetti's report ruled that the term wasn't hateful, because it had never been ruled to be hate speech by any court or tribunal.

As a result, Pasternak told The CJN at the time that the rewritten anti-discrimination rules were just a "mish-mash" of the old policy.

Jewish and pro-Israel groups have been reluctant to bring the matter up in court or at the Ontario Human Rights Commission.

Howard English, CIJA's senior vice-president for the greater Toronto region, helped draft his organization's latest plea to the city. He told The CJN he hopes Pennachetti will revise the policy so that groups such as QuAIA can't take part in city-sponsored events.

"While it is understandable that city staff would look to the human rights and criminal codes for direction, these statutes should not represent the sole criteria for the city to formulate a policy – whether it involves the Pride Parade or any other event," CIJA's deputation reads.

"City policy should be broader than one which is tied only to anti-discrimination considerations. It should rest on other factors, in addition to compliance with provincial and federal statutes."

One of those "factors" should be the city's own condemnation of the term "Israeli apartheid," which it passed last June, CIJA said.

CIJA also asked the city to consider demanding that groups such as Pride be held more accountable for their actions. That would help create "more transparency about the nature of an event for which funding has been approved," it said.

"After careful consideration of many factors, with the utmost respect for free speech, council would decide to grant, maintain or deny funding to an organization, guided by broader criteria."

Meanwhile, FSWC asked the city not to "align itself with hate groups" and to "withhold funding from future parades should Pride deem support for hate trumps acceptance and inclusiveness."

It said the city let the situation with Pride and QuAIA "fester" for too long.

More controversy arose earlier this year when it was revealed that one of the authors of the anti-discrimination policy had previously written for Rabble.ca, a left-wing website that routinely characterizes Israel as an apartheid state.

Uzma Shakir, the city's director of equity, diversity and human rights and who helps draft Toronto's anti-discrimination policy, posted numerous entries on the website prior to 2010. In one, she wrote that "Israelis invade, occupy and wage wars in the name of defending a Jewish homeland, and Americans continue to defend their policies of aggression in the name of a state that is firmly grounded in Christianity."

In another, she wrote that the terror groups Hamas and Hezbollah "allegedly question Israel's right to statehood."

Interviewed by The CJN last June, Shakir said her personal views did not extend to her professional role with the city, and she downplayed her input into drafting city policy, saying that she was one of many employees involved.

Manipulated by murderers

As of this writing, the evidence is mounting that the American ambassador to Libya, Christopher Stevens, and three of his colleagues were killed by terrorists in a well-planned, sophisticated attack. The four Americans were not victims of a frenzied mob violently expressing its outrage over the offensive content of a base, anti-Muslim film.

According to a report in the Times of Israel, a witness and a senior Libyan security official confirmed that heavily armed militants used the melee of the protest as a cover to attack the U.S. Consulate in Benghazi.

Wanis el-Sharef, eastern Libya's deputy interior minister, said the terrorists executed a two-pronged attack against the Americans. He added that it appeared the attackers had operated with insider information. They knew the precise whereabouts of a safe house to which the doomed diplomats had been taken.

Nor was the timing of the attack against the Americans in Libya, Egypt and Yemen a coincidence.

Stevens and his colleagues were killed in a commemorative celebration at the hands of pro-Al Qaeda terrorists, if not actual members of Al Qaeda, on 9/11.

The day following the attacks, Al Qaeda leader Ayman al-Zawahiri urged Muslims to "topple the western proxies" left in their countries. This was a clear reference to the governments who allow American forces to remain on the sacred Muslim soil of the Middle East.

Not only did al-Zawahiri target Americans, he also took aim at the favourite scapegoat of every Middle Eastern despot: Israel. The Islamic nation, he proclaimed, is capable of defeating the "Zionist-Crusader enterprise... in the heart of the Islamic world and especially in occupied Palestine, like it defeated this enterprise... in Iraq and Afghanistan, and like it managed to deliver the greatest blow in the history of America, on its own land, changing American history and destroying its economy."

There was clearly more to the story of the embassy violence last week than the anger evoked by a vindictive, infantile, stupid, silly film. The protests were angry, to be sure; but they were certainly not spontaneous. They were orchestrated by a sinister group of extremists intent on re-making the world in their Islamist image.

And now, once again, the Arab street throughout the explosive Middle East, is roiling. Mobs of mostly young and unemployed men become fast-moving armies, easily exploited by the blood-soaked hand in the background to provide the drama of the violent, rowdy, yet severely telegenic protest.

Last week, the mob in Benghazi was manipulated to provide cover for murder. Western governments must be wary of this even while they do their utmost to bring the murderers of the American diplomats to justice.

Closing of embassy in Tehran

Prime Minister Stephen Harper did the right thing by closing down the Canadian Embassy in Tehran and by expelling Iranian diplomats from Ottawa ("Canada severs diplomatic ties with Iran," Sept. 13). Iranian officials, from the president down, have slandered Israel, calling the country an insult to humanity and a cancerous tumour, and have issued calls for its disappearance. These insults from one member of the United Nations against the other should be grounds for Iran to be turfed from the United Nations. Instead, time after time, the UN Human Rights Council issues absurd resolutions condemning Israel for a variety of manufactured alleged transgressions. Not a word of condemnation against Iran, until finally Harper exhibits the courage and integrity to do to Iran what the United Nations and the rest of the world should have done a long time ago.

The United Church boycott

Three problem areas highlight the hypocrisy of the United Church's decision to boycott products from Israeli settlements in the West Bank ("Community outraged at United Church," Aug. 23):

- It ignores much worse occupation scenarios, all done for aggrandizement and not for survival. Among others, these include India's occupation of Kashmir since 1947; China's occupation of Tibet since 1950, and Morocco's occupation of Western Sahara since 1975. The United Church does not advocate boycotting the products of these settlements. When I pointed this out to a prominent BDS (boycotts, divestment and sanctions) advocate, she called this a red herring, and would continue to attack Israel only. I think it's because Israel is small and Jewish, and the others are not.

- It morally equates Israel's occupation of the West Bank with other occupations, when they are acknowledged at all. In May 1967, when everyone expected Israel's imminent demise, and all the guarantees of the United Nations and the United States proved worthless, Israel fought to survive. How ludicrous would it be for China to claim it conquered Tibet because Tibet had been trying to wipe out China? China conquered for aggrandizement, not for survival.

- It ignores evidence that boycotters aren't striving for an Israel with 1967 borders, but rather for no Israel at all.

Israel withdrew from Gaza and now Hamas is in charge there, dedicated to Israel's destruction. Why would anyone suppose a withdrawal from the West Bank would be different? Farfur, the Palestinian TV Mickey Mouse character, still teaches Arab children to hate Jews and to strive for Israel's destruction.

The Levy report

Smadar Meiri can quote the official Israeli government position during the 1967 Six Day War and the words of Israeli ambassador Abba Eban to her heart's content, but she cannot get past the fact that these good intentions were entirely one-sided ("Levy report requires rebuttal," letter, Aug. 23). At the end of the war, when Israel offered to return the territories, the Arab world rejected this offer in no uncertain terms: no negotiation, no peace, no recognition of Israel, the famous Khartoum "three nos." The Arab position has not changed one iota since then (and was no different before, either). Meiri then accuses Israel of "encroaching" on territory that will likely be conceded, yet in the very next sentence, admits that the settlements constitute only about five per cent of the captured territories and will likely be retained by Israel under any agreement. Despite this, she implies that anyone who agrees with the Levy report (which concluded that "Israelis have the legal right to settle in Judea and Samaria") cannot possibly "yearn for peace" (Levy report affirms Israel's rights to territory, Aug. 9).

Jacques Gauthier, a non-Jewish French-Canadian international lawyer has spent more than 20 years studying the legal claims of the various parties to the territories in Judea, Samaria and Jerusalem. His doctoral thesis – successfully defended and therefore, presumably, accurate in its understanding of international law – agrees wholeheartedly with the conclusions of the Levy report.

Jewish exodus from Arab lands: redressing injustices

First of two parts

Aharon Mor and Orly R. Rahimiyan

After Israel's birth, Jewish life in Arab lands became untenable

For more than 2,500 years Jewish communities have existed in the lands now known as the Middle East and North Africa. In Aden, Algeria, Egypt, Iraq, Lebanon, Libya, Morocco, Syria, Tunisia and Yemen, as well as in Iran. All of these Jewish communities, however, were severely endangered by the events of the mid-20th century. The spread of Nazi propaganda and extreme Arab nationalism in the 1930s and 1940s threatened the status of Jews throughout the Middle East, and the establishment of the State of Israel in 1948 spurred almost all of these Arab countries to declare war, or support the war, against Israel.

This anti-Zionist sentiment in the Middle East was not directed solely at the State of Israel. Jews living in Arab countries were uprooted from their homes or became subjugated political hostages. In virtually all cases in which Jews fled, their individual and communal properties were unduly seized, expropriated, or confiscated without just compensation from the relevant Arab governments. Furthermore, these Jews were the fortunate ones. Many Jews did not get to leave these Arab countries, but rather were imprisoned, tortured, raped or murdered.

About one million Jews lived in the Arab lands of North Africa and the Middle East at the start of the 20th century. By the start of the 21st century, less than three per cent of that one million still remain, mostly in Iran and Morocco. Approximately 650,000 Jews from the Middle East and North Africa immigrated to Israel between 1948 and 1972 – two-thirds of the Jewish immigrants in this period. Israel absorbed these immigrants at great expense, without receiving compensation from the Arab and Iranian governments that confiscated their possessions.

An estimated $6 to $30 billion (in today's currency) in assets were left behind by the Jews of Arab countries and Iran. The demand of the Jews from Arab countries is not only for financial compensation for their property and rights. What these Jewish refugees want most of all is redress for the historical injustice that they and their communities suffered. Thus, the demand includes an historical reckoning with the tragic events that led to the mass exodus of Jewish individuals and communities from Arab lands, many of which had hosted large and flourishing Jewish communities for more than 2,000 years.

History of Jews in Arab countries

After the Babylonian conquest of the kingdom of Judea and the destruction of the First Temple in 586 BCE, Jews began to settle in various regions of what is now called the Middle East and North Africa. In the centuries following the Muslim conquest of the region in the seventh century CE, Jews were considered second-class subjects but were nonetheless permitted limited religious, educational, professional, and business opportunities.

Contrary to widespread perceptions that Jews led comfortable and safe lives, the reality was that the status of Jews under Islam was often precarious. While the rules of Dhimma, or "protected minorities," afforded to Jews and other minorities a form of conditional protection, in no way did it grant Jews treatment as dignified equals. Different Islamic regimes over the centuries imposed serious restrictions on Jews in both the legal and societal arenas. These restrictions frequently were manifested as expressions of contempt, denial of dignity, and incidents of recurring violence targeting Jewish individuals and communities.

In the 19th century, the establishment of colonial regimes in the Middle East and North Africa, chiefly by France and Great Britain, allowed Jews to escape the miserable conditions so often provided to them under the rules of Dhimma. Under colonial rule, Jews enhanced their everyday lives and improved their status in society. Efforts by Jewish organizations such as the Alliance Israélite Universelle, which set up a modern network of schools throughout the Middle East, provided Jews with technical skills to integrate in their countries' developing economies. Jews often used their skills and knowledge of foreign languages to act as intermediaries between the European colonialists and the indigenous Muslim population, and often found work in colonial administrations. In countries such as Egypt, Iraq and Libya, Jews became a crucial element in the development of key sectors of the economy.

Morocco, ruled by Vichy France, Jews endured years of restrictions and fear. In Iraq, nearly 200 Baghdadi Jews were killed and 1,000 injured in a violent pogrom in 1941 called the Farhud, which was initiated by Arab anti-British mobs who identified Jews as collaborators with the British. By the end of the war, Jews' sense of security in their countries of residence had been seriously undermined, as had their trust in the colonial powers to defend them. Increasingly, Jews looked to Jewish sovereignty in Palestine as a solution to their plight.

The end of normal Jewish life in Arab lands

The increasingly tense atmosphere surrounding the events in Palestine and Israel's subsequent independence signalled the end of normal Jewish life in Arab lands. During the 1947 Palestine Partition debate at the United Nations, the Egyptian, Iraqi and Palestinian delegates issued violent threats against the indigenous Jewish communities of the Middle East and Africa. These threats were carried out in the weeks and months after the Nov. 29 partition vote, as hundreds of Jews living in Arab lands were massacred in government-sponsored rioting. This resulted in thousands of injuries and millions of dollars in destroyed Jewish property.

Upon the establishment of the State of Israel in 1948, the status of Jews in Arab countries changed dramatically, as virtually all Arab countries declared war, or backed the war, against Israel. The Arab world's rejection of the Jewish state triggered a deliberate surge in state-legislated discrimination and abuse by Arab regimes and their citizenry, making Jewish residence in Arab countries simply untenable, as some Arab leaders, including the secretary general of the Arab League, had threatened all along. In many cases Arab governments evicted their indigenous Jewish populations as part of an expulsion campaign. These campaigns included discriminatory legislation, confiscation of citizenship, limitations on the freedom of movement of Jews, random arrests and forced imprisonment, exclusion from the civil service and quotas in certain fields of employment.

Such government-endorsed campaigns don't include the innumerable cases of individual citizens who carried out acts of violence, abuse, and theft targeting Jews. The value of Jewish property confiscated by Arab governments during these expulsions is estimated to be in the tens of billions of today's dollars.

The plight of Jewish refugees was not widely publicized, predominantly because they did not remain refugees for long. Of the hundreds of thousands of Jewish refugees between 1948 and 1972, some two-thirds were resettled in Israel at great expense, all without any compensation provided by the Arab governments who confiscated their possessions.

Moreover, Arab nations conducted misinformation campaigns portraying Jewish life in Arab lands as ideal and respectful, while downplaying the vulnerability and lack of rights suffered by Jews in these lands throughout history. Such efforts also have striven to eliminate the historical contribution of Jews to the larger Arab societies from local and international consciousness. These misinformation campaigns also bred the accusations that the Jews left Arab countries and Iran voluntarily and, therefore, forfeited their rights to any compensation.

The post-World War I period presented mixed signals for Jews residing in Arab lands. Jews continued to prosper in the social and economic arenas. However, signs of large-scale rejection by the Muslim majority were becoming increasingly apparent. Local independence movements, which were oriented around the rejection of colonial authority, frequently adopted pan-Arab and pan-Islamic rhetoric without providing a platform to non-Muslim minorities. The best example is the Nasserite regime in Egypt, which promoted pan-Arab nationalism. At the time, Jews were seen as collaborators benefiting from the colonial powers, and this perception was combined with the frustration felt by the Muslim masses that Dhimma rule had been suspended in the Jews' favour. The volatile issue of Palestine became a pivotal aspect of pan-Arab propaganda, serving to further antagonize the Arab masses against the Jewish populations living among them. In Egypt, as the partition of Palestine and the founding of Israel drew closer, hostility strengthened, fed also by the press attacks on all foreigners that accompanied the rising ethnocentric nationalism of the age.

World War II brought increased suffering for the Jewish communities in the Arab world. Communities in German-occupied Libya and Tunisia faced persecution, and hundreds of Jews were deported to local work camps or to European extermination camps. In Algeria and

Two infinitudes, two pockets

The 17th-century French mathematician and philosopher Blaise Pascal noted that, as human beings in the world of nature, we are poised between two infinitudes that define us.

On the one hand, there is the infinitely small. We see only the world of the visible. But, Pascal observed, so much is hidden from us – atomic particles, invisible tiny creatures. “All this visible world,” he wrote, “is but an imperceptible point in the ample bosom of nature.”

On the other hand, as Pascal pointed out, there is the infinitely vast. He wrote: “Nature is an infinite sphere whose centre is everywhere and whose circumference is nowhere.”

In other words, the universe humbles us. Pascal expresses this in language resonant with the Yom Kippur liturgy: “For after all, what is man in nature? A nothing in relation to infinity, an all in relation to nothing, a point between nothing and everything and infinitely far from understanding either. The ends of things and their beginnings are impregnably concealed from him in an impenetrable secret. He is equally incapable of seeing the nothingness out of which he was drawn and the infinite in which he is engulfed.”

Pascal's meditation on the place of humanity in the universe resonates deeply with the thrust of the High Holiday liturgy. His two-sided image of human existence – “a nothing in relation to infinity, an all in relation to nothing” – brings to mind a famous story attributed to Rabbi Simcha Bunim of Peshischa, a chassidic rebbe in the late-18th and early-19th centuries, a little over a century after Pascal. Unusual for his time, he was both a Chassid and a scientist, an intellectual who read philosophy alongside chassidic teachings and believed that study was the route to a close emotional connection with God.

Because of its thematic connection to the Yamim Noraim liturgy, one of Rabbi Bunim's stories is often retold in the commentary sections and notes of High Holiday machzorim. Every person should have two pockets, with a note in one saying, “Bishvili nivra ha'olam” (for my sake was the world created), and a note in the other saying, “Anochi afar va'efer” (I am dust and ashes).

Most retellings of the story add an interpretation: when we feel worthless, we find reassurance in the note that affirms our centrality to the world. But, lest we get a swelled head, the other message deflates our arrogance. Interpreted in this way, the story addresses the contradiction that our tradition assigns to our position, and that the Yom Kippur liturgy emphasizes: master over all living things, and, at the same time, insignificant and impermanent.

The man with the pockets is a bit like Alice in Wonderland with the magic mushroom: one side makes her grow to gigantic proportions, the other side shrinks her to the point of and eventually in writing, and varying versions can be found.

In one version, the rebbe adds instructions: one must also divide his money between the two note-bearing pockets. When we come upon human misery and injustice, the note stating that the world was created for us functions as a call to action, a reminder of our commonality and obligation to other human beings, our responsibility to other creatures and the natural world. Rather than asserting our importance, the note impels us to use our resources for tikkun olam.

When we feel a longing for material possessions, the other note reminds us of the enduring importance of our spiritual side, because the physical world fades. Evoking our mortality, it is designed not to deflate us, but to give us the courage of our convictions and the sense of urgency to do what we believe is right. Focusing us less on what we are, and more on what we might do, this version carries us from the meditations of the liturgy into the world awaiting us outside.

vanishing. If she eats from one side, the world cannot contain her. If she eats from the other, she risks slipping into non-being.

But other versions and other interpretations of the story exist, and these, too, bear in interesting ways on the themes of the High Holidays. Like many rabbis' teachings, Rabbi Bunim's story was passed down through his disciples, orally

Moving from fear to faith

As Jews, we've never had it so good. This assertion is contrary to the received wisdom in many circles in the Jewish community. Its leaders, often primed by cynical fundraising professionals, erroneously assume that by presenting Jews as a hounded minority and Israel as if on the brink of destruction, they're helping to promote communal cohesiveness and individual loyalty.

The 12-page supplement to the July 28 issue of the influential international weekly the Economist presents a very different and more accurate picture.

Its opening paragraph reads: “Judaism is flourishing, both in Israel, where 43 per cent of the world's Jews now live, and throughout the Jewish Diaspora. The Jews as a nation are flourishing too. Israelis, for all their problems, are the 14th-happiest people in the world, happier than the British or the French, according to a recent global happiness report commissioned by the UN. In the Diaspora, Jewish life has never been so free, so prosperous, so unthreatened.”

At least three reasons come to mind in support of this assertion. First, wherever in the world Jews live today, they do so by choice, not of necessity. Second, Jewish movers and shakers in our voluntary Diaspora are out of proportion to our numbers. Third, the dramatic success of the Jewish state has led to a historic transformation of Jewish self-confidence and power everywhere.

The ghetto is no more, even though naysayers pretend otherwise. They point to the allegedly dwindling Jewish population, the persistence of antisemitism, often in the guise of anti-Zionism, and the political and military dangers that Israel is facing.

Without seeking to deny any of this, there're nevertheless compelling reasons to celebrate the overwhelmingly positive aspects of contemporary Jewish life. The cyn-

Rabbi Dow Marmur
in Toronto

ical stress on doom and gloom may turn into a self-fulfilling prophecy, because a growing number of young Jews are being put off by it and, as a result, choose to withdraw altogether from Judaism and Jewry.

Rabbi Donniel Hartman, president of the Shalom Hartman in Jerusalem, is well aware of it. He writes: “As a people we have replaced vision with crisis as the central force and motivation of identity, philanthropy, and unity. We have found amongst the plethora of demographic studies an inexhaustible gold mine. We now have an unending source to feed our fear.”

The fear of demography is being augmented by the fear of antisemitism. There are organizations in our midst whose main objective seems to be to identify enemies in the vain belief that this will strengthen our commitment to Judaism. Not that we should be blind to prejudice and discrimination, but we must see the incidents in proportion, not in distortion. And we must never allow our enemies to define our Judaism!

And if the fears of demography and antisemitism aren't enough, there's the fear of the annihilation of Israel, promoted by reactionary forces that assume a catastrophic prognosis will galvanize the Jewish people.

Rabbi Hartman's critique of the fear of demography is, therefore, equally relevant to the other fears that cloud our sense of reality and poison our efforts to enjoy being Jewish. He writes: “We don't need a demography of fear; we need a demography of aspirations and responsibility.” And again: “We need to marshal our talent to create a different reality, to remove self-destructive policies, and through the power of ideas offer an alternative and compelling vision.”

Rabbi Hartman challenges us to repudiate fearmongering. I understand him to imply that, for example, instead of bewailing intermarriage and the low Jewish birthrate, the community should reach out to all Jews, including non-Jewish spouses and their children, to make Judaism sufficiently attractive for them.

Instead of consistently playing the antisemitism card, we must promote interfaith and intercultural understanding in the service of an open and healthy society, both in Israel and in the Diaspora.

Thus, for example, although the recent malicious United Church resolution to boycott goods from Israel should be decisively repudiated, contact with the organization must be maintained, and even intensified. It'll also effectively strengthen those who're pained by the apparent anti-Jewish direction of their church.

As for Israel, in addition to protecting ourselves from enemies from without, we must face the problems within by helping to bridge the potentially self-destructive gaps in Israeli society in economics, religion, politics, gender equality and many other areas.

In this season of collective introspection, we turn to our religious and communal leaders to help us move from fear to faith.

A Kafkaesque drama unfolds in Tel Aviv

Franz Kafka, an aspiring, unknown Czech Jewish writer living in Prague, was a clerk by day, toiling anonymously over personal injury claims for the Worker's Accident Insurance Institute.

Writing at night, after a long day's work, he published a few short stories and finished his novella, The Metamorphosis, before his untimely death on June 3, 1924.

Prior to succumbing to tuberculosis in a Vienna sanatorium, Kafka penned a letter to his friend, Max Brod, a journalist, author and composer whom he had met in 1902 when they were both students at Charles University. The letter, discovered in his desk in Prague, took the form of a request. "Dearest Max," Kafka wrote, "Everything I leave behind me... in the way of diaries, manuscripts, letters, sketches and so on, to be burned."

Kafka had already burned most of his personal documents, but had not gotten around to disposing of his unpublished novels. Brod ignored his friend's last wish, justifying his decision on the basis of a letter he had sent to Kafka in 1921 in which he had said he would definitely not burn his papers.

Brod had enormous faith in Kafka's talents, though Kafka himself was doubtful about his abilities. Brod, therefore, decided to prepare Kafka's novels for posthumous publication.

Since Kafka's German-language novels were unfinished, Brod tinkered with them, altering punctuation, changing the order of chapters and the like.

Thanks to Brod's belief in Kafka, and his skills as an editor, three of Kafka's seminal novels, The Trial, The Castle and Amerika, were published in the 1920s.

Brod, a Zionist, departed for Palestine in 1939, leaving Prague literally minutes before Germany closed the Czech border. Packed into one of his suitcases were the rest of Kafka's papers.

More than 70 years on, the contents of Brod's suitcase have become the object of a literary cause célèbre, the hub of legal wrangling and the subject of a new Israel documentary, Kafka's Last Story, which was screened at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival recently.

After arriving in Palestine, Brod and his wife, Elsa Taussig, settled down in Tel Aviv, where they lived until the end of their lives. Brod, a dramatist for the Habimah Theatre, grew close to Otto and Esther Hoffe, a couple he had met after his wife's death in 1942.

Brod, supposedly an extrovert and a womanizer, employed Esther as a secretary, but she was probably his lover as well.

With Brod's passing in 1968, his valued trove of Kafka papers was passed to Esther, who kept them in an apartment she shared with dozens of cats.

In fact, Esther was in possession of one-third of the papers, Brod having sent two-thirds of the cache to Switzerland in 1956 to Kafka's four nieces.

One of the nieces, Marianna Steiner, bequeathed the bulk of the papers to Oxford University's Bodleian Library so that the first critical edition of her uncle's writings could be published.

During the following years, she and her relatives donated yet more of the papers to the library. Today, they are jointly owned by Oxford University and one of the daughters of Kafka's sister.

The Oxford University collection consists of diaries, letters, postcards, drawings, doodles, photographs and notebooks in which Kafka practised Hebrew and wrote some of his novels and short stories.

In 1988, 19 years before she died, Esther sold the original manuscript of The Trial to the German Literature Archive in Marbach, Germany, for close to $2 million. The sale prompted the American novelist Philip Roth to quip that a "Kafkaesque irony" had been inflicted on the world because Kafka's three sisters had been murdered during the Holocaust.

With Esther's death in 2007, her two daughters, Eva Hoffe and Ruth Wiesler, assumed ownership of the papers.

But due to ambiguities in Brod's will, the National Library in Jerusalem claimed a right to them, contending that Brod had left the papers to Esther as an executor rather than as a beneficiary.

In his will, Brod stipulated that his literary estate should be placed in the National Library, Tel Aviv's municipal library "or another public archive in Israel or abroad." Since the Tel Aviv library renounced its claim, the National Library remains the only claimant.

This past April, Israeli Attorney General Yehuda Weinstein ruled that the papers belong to the public and should be held in public trust by the National Library, noting that Brod's wishes should be respected.

Weinstein in his verdict stated, "It seems that the deceased, who was Jewish and a Zionist and who came to Israel after Prague was taken over by the Nazis, would have wanted his literary estate to be kept by the State of Israel, which was the centre of his life and was where he died."

In closing, he claimed that Eva Hoffe and Ruth Wiesler (who died last May) had not proven that they had received the manuscripts from their mother as a gift.

Several months ago, the director-general of the National Library, Oren Weinberg, announced that he would make the papers available on the Internet and would publish Brod's works, most of which have not been translated into Hebrew.

In the meantime, however, they remain in Tel Aviv, scattered between Esther's apartment on Spinoza Street in the centre of the city and several safety deposit boxes in banks. It will be left to a court in Tel Aviv to decide whether the papers are the property of Eva Hoffe and her late sister, Ruth, the National Library or the German archive.

The drama over the final disposition of the Kafka papers has consumed Israeli filmmaker Sagi Bornstein, whose documentary rehearses the controversy.

"It's a great story to tell," he said in an interview while the Toronto Jewish Film Festival was in progress.

Franz Kafka

Max Brod

Bornstein declined to say which of the parties in the dispute has a rightful claim to the papers.

"What's important now is that they be digitized for everyone to see. It's not a big deal who actually owns them."

He intends to make a sequel to Kafka's Last Story once the case has been definitively resolved by the court.

"There is still no end to it," he said. "There is still a lot of unfinished business."

Bornstein's opinion of Kafka remains undimmed. "He had an amazing imagination. He was a genius."

Jews, Muslims meet to break down stereotypes

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

The Jewish-Muslim dialogue in Toronto is gathering steam. Last week, some 65 people gathered at a Toronto library to discuss ways of improving relations between the two groups. At the same time, around 10 Pakistani journalists interviewed three Canadian Jews by phone on a range of topics, including Israel and the purported Jewish control of the media and Hollywood.

Organizers termed the meetings a success. "The vibrations were very positive," said David Nitkin, president of EthicScan, one of the conveners. "It was a chance to break stereotypes and hear people's stories."

Tariq Khan, publisher of Weekly Press Pakistan (WPP), an online news service in English and Urdu, said, "My vision is that we are building a bridge between Jews and Muslims. Also, my main objective is that non-Arab Muslims should recognize, accept the Jewish State of Israel... [This] will take some time, because it is such a large [Muslim] population."

The meeting marks the fourth time Jews and Muslims have gathered in Toronto to explore ways to improve relations. The gatherings have attracted the attention of Jewish communities across North America.

"It helps that Tariq knows 1,400 journalists [in Pakistan] and can push the message in Urdu, Pashtun and Arabic," Nitkin said.

Participants at last week's gathering included 50 adults and a little more than a dozen high schools students from both communities.

Participants talked about the mundane – their day-to-day lives, how they came to Canada, what they do for a living – to how they perceive the State of Israel. The Muslim participants, who largely hailed from Pakistan, India and Bangladesh, discussed the impact of 9-11 on them.

Jewish participants were asked about Israel, and even what a kippah is, Nitkin said.

Many of the Muslim participants had heard very little about the Holocaust, largely because not much is written about it in Urdu, Khan said. His own wife was "completely surprised" to learn about it. The Jewish participants largely were unaware of the "holocaust" suffered by Muslims in 1947 during the partition of the Indian subcontinent into the modern states of India and Pakistan, he added.

The journalist interviews reflect increased interest in Israel, Khan said. WPP is doing its part, providing news about the Jewish state to Urdu-speaking readers, thanks to an arrangement with the Israeli Tazpit news service.

A write up on the WPP website provided readers with highlights of the international press conference. The Jewish participants – Nitkin, Judie Oron, an Israeli-Canadian journalist and author of Cry of the Giraffe, and Andria Spindel, president of the March of Dimes – were asked about the history of the Jewish People and their ties to Israel.

WPP reported that the Jewish interviewees said there was no need to have tension between Pakistan and Israel and that Israeli people "see a bright future for Pakistan, which may become a bridge of tolerance and co-operation to connect Israel with the Muslim world in the near future."

Responding to suggestions that Jews control the media, the Jewish participants said if that was the case, why are the media so often critical of Jews and hostile to Israel? WPP reported the participants asking.

The Jewish interlocutors also referred to Israeli academic excellence and scientific achievements. They noted that the Palestinians living in Israel participate in Israeli elections, practise their religion and enjoy a higher standard of living than Arabs living nearby.

"What emerged... was how little contact there was between Pakistani Muslims and Jews. The lack of good information in Pakistan about Israel is unfortunate," WPP said.

Nitkin said the dialogue has drawn the attention of not only those who wish to emulate it, but also those who oppose it.

He is, however, hoping to see others seeking goodwill run similar programs. He would also like to see more programs, such as joint sports and cultural events and perhaps a fact-finding tour by Canadian Muslims to Israel.

Khan himself has repeatedly expressed an interest in visiting Israel. Ajmi Muslim – those who are not Arab – "have no grudge against the Jews or Israel," he said.

In fact, Afghani Pashtuns are historically descendants of some of the 10 lost tribes of Israel and call themselves sons of Joseph, or sons of David and sons of Moses, he said.

Khan said the dialogue is scheduled to continue, with the next meeting likely at the end of October. "What we are doing here, the message is going to Pakistan. We want to create a strong basis for further dialogue."

About the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem

The Canadian Society for Yad Vashem is one of the largest and most prominent societies among Yad Vashem's 28 representative bodies worldwide. The Society supports Yad Vashem's initiatives and implements its important vision across Canada. Through its educational and commemorative activities, the Society carries out Yad Vashem's mission of ensuring that the Holocaust and its lessons are forever engraved in the memory of humankind.

About the Remember. Reflect. Recommit Campaign

The Remember. Reflect. Recommit Campaign will revitalize the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem Holocaust Wall of Remembrance, a memorial site at Earl Bales Park. This site was built by the founders of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem to commemorate those who perished in the Holocaust and to pay tribute to Survivors, who, after rebuilding their lives in Canada, have since passed away. Structures at the Holocaust Wall of Remembrance, existing and new, as well as landscaped gardens, will serve as a backdrop to meaningful events such as the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem Yizkor Ceremony, programs, and initiatives that will allow people of all faiths to learn about the Holocaust and its universal lessons. The campaign offers a variety of prominent naming opportunities, which will allow you to honour the legacy of a loved one.

About Yizkor

Yizkor, which means "remembrance" in Hebrew, is Judaism's memorial prayer that is traditionally recited by family members to remember and elevate the souls of their dearly departed loved ones. Occurring during Judaism's most holy days, between Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur, the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem Yizkor Ceremony is the public observance for our community to remember those who were murdered in the Shoah and to pay homage to Holocaust Survivors.

UJA has always been on the forefront of advocating on behalf of the Jewish people in Canada, in Israel and around the world. We were there fighting to free Soviet Jewry, and we are there now combating international efforts to delegitimize Israel and her right to exist. Through the UJA funded Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs we are involved in the promotion of human rights for all Canadians, monitoring anti-Israel activities on campus, fighting anti-semitism and offering a Jewish voice in the Canadian public square.

Temmy Latner Centre reaches out with picnic

Barbara Simmons
Special to The CJN

Toronto's Forest Hill, typically bucolic and stately, is also a place of hustle-bustle, moms and strollers, dogs with attitude, parks and great coffee.

A floor above a coffee shop on Spadina Road, operating for almost 12 years amid secular world commerce, is the Temmy Latner Forest Hill Jewish Centre.

Its members and leaders thrive on community involvement with events such as the recent Picnic in the Park, which featured magic, crafts, games and food in a circus-like atmosphere. The Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur "Family Experience" was a one-hour interactive service for everyone – especially parents, children and grandparents – to learn together while sitting on beanbag chairs, taste-testing apple, honey and pomegranate, and experiencing an interactive puppet show and shofar blowing.

The aim of the Temmy Latner Centre, led by the dynamic Rabbi Elie Karfunkel, is to nourish individual community connection through learning, living and the celebration of Jewish life. More than 200 families are involved with the centre.

The centre plans to move to a soon-to-be-built new home just down the street from the current location. The Temmy Latner Centre is a living legacy to the Jaslo Synagogue in Poland, which was destroyed in the Holocaust, and is open to Jewish people of all levels of observance.

Perhaps it is that openness that people see and feel when it comes to the centre's appeal. It has a reputation for giving people what they want in terms of Jewish education and worship, as well as community programming.

The centre is moving forward at warp speed, possibly because of its commitment to inclusiveness.

"This community has an open feeling. Some people are wary of approaching an Orthodox synagogue, but the majority of our community come from all levels of observances," said Dalia Appelrouth, whose husband, Rabbi David Appelrouth, is the centre's educational director.

Rabbi Karfunkel said that "people want to go to a place where they don't necessarily take themselves seriously, but they take their Judaism seriously. It's the members of our centre that make it special. Everyone knows your name, kind of like Cheers. It's a warm place and people can connect."

Darren Gluckman, a single dad who doesn't come from a traditional background, agrees. "The centre has opened my eyes to the beauty of traditional Judaism, and the community has welcomed me and my daughter without question or judgment," he said.

Youth director Sam Weisbrod works to increase the synergy between the centre and those who access its educational programming. "Our objective is to let the Forest Hill Jewish community know about our great events, as our planning is essentially to expose kids to the awesomeness of Judaism," said Weisbrod.

It has taken awhile for the Temmy Latner Centre to establish a place within the community. Since 2000 "the little community that could" has defied the odds against gaining a prominent place in a city that already has established religious centres of every denomination

Weisbrod said the centre aims to offer programs that people can enjoy. "We offer social programs, serious and fun programs," he said.

Dalia Appelrouth stressed that the centre is committed to making Judaism exciting and available to all Jews, and specifically those in Forest Hill. "We want to engage the community to become inspired and further educated about their rich Jewish heritage in bite-size, fun, intellectually stimulating programs," she said. "We strive for a warm environment where we are not judgmental of anyone who walks through our doors."

The Temmy Latner Centre also offers unique outreach services such as two weeks of delivering daily hot dinners to members with newborns, as well as the "mezuzah doctor," who will make house calls to the members of the Jewish community, ensuring parchments and lettering of mezuzahs are in good condition, and positioned properly on outdoor doorways.

From tots to teen programs, including hosting Torah High, the centre's educational programming is relevant to everyday life. At a recent open-to-the-public event the centre held in a Forest Hill home, school phobia was a hot topic shared by concerned parents.

And then there is the romantic nature of Temmy Latner Centre. It is a big singles scene, especially during the weekly Saturday morning kiddush. Weisbrod isn't joking when he suggests that a "lot of couples have met their significant other over the chicken fingers."

IDF represents all Jews, major general says

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

The Israel Defence Forces' first female major general, Orna Barbivay, was in Toronto last week to talk about the demographic challenges facing Israel's army and to appeal to the Jewish community to support its soldiers.

Barbivay, the keynote speaker at the annual fundraiser for the Association for the Soldiers of Israel - Canada (ASI-Canada) on Sept. 9 at Beth Tzedec Congregation, spoke to The CJN about the importance of the relationship between the Diaspora and Israeli Jewish communities, as well as the significance of organizations such as ASI-Canada.

Although there are many people in Israel and abroad who are eager to serve their country, the army struggles with a growing number of citizens - particularly women - who seek exemptions, said the 50-year-old Barbivay, who made history in June 2011 when she was appointed as head of the IDF's manpower directorate and became Israel's first female major general.

Many of those who seek exemption do so for religious reasons, she said, adding that she hopes more haredim will choose to enlist and that the IDF will be able to accommodate them without compromising the quality of the army.

Barbivay stressed the army's connection to the Diaspora.

"The IDF doesn't just represent Israelis, but Jews all over the world," she said. "It's important that everyone does their part, whether they're Jews in Israel or living abroad, in whatever way they can."

She noted the "bond that we have with Canada, that is one of unity and a shared ambition to see Israel thrive."

During her time in Toronto, Barbivay addressed students at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's Richmond Hill campus, as well as students at Bialik Hebrew Day School, and she met with ASI-Canada's young leaders.

Barbivay, who conducted the interview in Hebrew, said organizations that support the IDF are important "because terrorism is becoming more of an issue."

There have been many political changes in the Middle East and the IDF needs to be ready to deal with those challenges and changes."

ASI-Canada is a non-profit organization that supports Israeli soldiers on active duty by offering social, educational, cultural and recreational programs.

Among the many programs is one designed for "Lone Soldiers," or soldiers who don't have family support in Israel - whether they're orphaned or have chosen to leave their families behind and move to Israel to volunteer in the army.

According to Barbivay, about half of the 5,000 lone soldiers come from the Diaspora.

"We try to give them everything they need, because they are coming as volunteers. We want to do everything we can to make them comfortable."

Barbivay, a mother of three, added, "I want their parents to know that if they send their kids to Israel to serve that they'll be taken care of."

Speaking about the issue of the decline of females enlisting in the army, she said 42 per cent of women don't enlist. "In my eyes, that number is really bad. We talk about everyone needing to enlist, and we see that 42 per cent aren't going."

Of that 42 per cent, about 35 per cent claim religion as the reason, and some make that claim falsely, she said.

According to an agreement between the Jewish state and the first Israeli Chief Rabbinate, religious women are exempt from IDF service if they choose not to serve.

"For those who claim religion as a reason, if they are thought to be using it as an excuse, we want to be able to force them to go... We're trying to make everyone go, even if it means changing the law," Barbivay said.

She added that for each young woman who falsely claims to be religiously observant in order to escape service, there is another who actually is religiously observant but chooses to serve despite the difficulties.

"There are religious women who even get to the rank of officer, so when we see them succeeding, it makes me think that all religious women can," she said.

In recent years, 90 per cent of military jobs, with the exception of core fighting units, have opened up to women.

"Women have all the opportunities to advance if they want to," she said.

Demographics suggest that the difficulties with the haredi community will not be subsiding over the next 15 years.

What to eat before you don't

On Yom Kippur, we are supposed to be thinking about prayer and atonement, and not about earthly pleasures such as eating and drinking. Unfortunately, fasting can often force us to focus on our stomachs and not on our souls. To help us keep on track, here are some tips to help prepare for the fast.

In the days leading up to the fast...

- Taper off from caffeine: "The nausea and headaches many people report while fasting have nothing to do either with food or fluid," says dietician Judy Baumann. "They are usually the result of caffeine withdrawal. People who drink several cups of coffee a day taper to half decaf and half regular a week or so ahead of time. Then they gradually work their way down to only decaffeinated coffee by Yom Kippur." [<http://bit.ly/fastip1>]

- Vary your meal schedule in the week before the fast: If you are extremely regular about your mealtimes, eating at different times tells your body not to expect to be fed at precisely 12:30 p.m. and 6 p.m. [<http://bit.ly/fastip3>]

- Eat a big breakfast: Start the day with a large breakfast based on cereals, breads and fruits, which can provide the energy you need during the day. These high-fibre foods will be far downstream by the time of the pre-fast meal and will not keep you from eating enough food at the pre-fast meal. [<http://bit.ly/fastip4>]

- Drink up: The hardest part of fasting is dehydration. Drink plenty of fluids throughout the day. [<http://bit.ly/fastip5>]

- And cool down: Make sure you are in a well-ventilated area especially if it's hot out. Keeping your body temperature normal will help keep you hydrated. [<http://bit.ly/fastip6>]

During the pre-fast meal...

- Don't stuff yourself: Eat a normal meal that balances car-

Jewish & Digital

Mark Mietkiewicz

bohydrates, fibre and protein. "The temptation to stuff oneself with as much food as possible before a fast may seem appealing, but in truth it is unwise," explains chef Lauren Braun Costello. "The more you eat, the more you want to fill your belly the next time around. So it is recommended to eat a normal-size meal... [Avoid] particularly salty foods that will make you thirsty or dehydrated. Complex carbohydrates and proteins are ideal." [<http://bit.ly/fastip7>]

- Make that meal tasty: That pre-fast meal doesn't have to be bland. Spices such as lemon or herbs are fine for fasting, but salt and monosodium glutamate should be reduced as much as possible. [<http://bit.ly/fastip4>] You can go with the tried-and-true chicken soup and potatoes or consider Sautéed Porcini Chicken and Arugula Salad. [<http://bit.ly/fastip8>] According to the Talmud, eating before the fast is a mitzvah equal to the mitzvah of fasting on the day of Yom Kippur. [<http://bit.ly/fastip9>]

- Take extra care if you have a special medical need: Speak to your doctor and rabbi, if you are diabetic [<http://bit.ly/fastip10>] pregnant [<http://bit.ly/fastip11>] or nursing. [<http://bit.ly/fastip18>]

Several websites warn people with eating disorders about the dangers of fasting. The role of piyutim in tshuvah

Many people ask me about the piyutim. What are they, where do they come from, and are we obligated to sing them?

Piyutim are liturgical songs composed as early as the eighth century and sung during the High Holidays, as well as Shabbat, yamim tovim, and lifecycle events. The rabbis who composed them were great thinkers and scholars who wrote them to help us to immerse ourselves in the themes of the holidays and to elevate our tfillah (prayer) and our attempts at tshuvah (repentance).

The custom of reciting piyutim in the services is ancient. The Rambam (1135-1204) references them in his Guide for the Perplexed, as does Avraham Ibn Ezra (1090-1167) in his commentary to Kohelet. Ibn Ezra himself composed many piyutim with the intention of having them incorporated in the liturgy of Shabbat and the holidays, and his father was one of the most renowned paytanim (liturgical poets) in history: Rabbi Yehuda Halevi (1075-1141) was an outstanding pay- tan, as was Rabbi Shlomo Ibn Gabirol (1021-1058). Rabbeinu Bachya (d. 1340) quotes stanzas from famous piyutim in his Chovot Halevavot.

Rabbi Yosef Ibn Migash (1077-1141), the Rambam's father's teacher, gave a responsum in which he states that the inclusion of piyutim in the holiday liturgy is an old and universally accepted custom. Even earlier, Rav Saadia Gaon

Sephardi Window

Rabbi Ilan Acoca

(882-942) includes piyutim in his siddur and states that he has selected what were in his opinion the best ones, implying that many others were already in circulation by this time.

One of the classic piyutim in the Sephardi tradition, Shema Koli, was written by Rav Hai Gaon (969-1038) himself.

Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur are days where we attempt to achieve the mental and emotional state of lifnei HaShem (standing before God). Once in this state, we begin, through prayer, to focus on repentance and the purpose of our lives. Thus, we see that prayer is the central mitzvah (commandment) during the Yamim Nora'im (Days of Awe) and that the piyutim prepare us emotionally for this special experience.

While all Jews have piyutim in their liturgy, they are integral to, and especially so, in the Sephardi tradition. The piyutim serve to connect us to God and to our fellow Jews as well.

One of the most powerful and inspirational moments of the year is Neilah, the final prayer of Yom Kippur, when I hear my congregation sing the well-known piyut, El Nora Alila, written by the famous poet Rav Moshe Ibn Ezra (father of Avraham Ibn Ezra cited above). It is a moment that reminds me of my childhood and brings me to tears of hope and promise for the new year. This piyut is such a profoundly moving way to conclude Yom Kippur.

The beauty of our piyutim in these Days of Awe, and indeed throughout the year, fosters a closeness to God. Let each of us strive this year to tap into the power of the piyutim in order to realize the tshuvah that each of us is seeking.

Can such tolerance ever be again?

Rabbi Erwin Schild

Rummaging through some old files, I came across a printed program from an important event in our Jewish community, the dedication of a new synagogue. It was the new building of the Shaarei Shomayim Congregation on St. Clair Avenue West in Toronto.

The date was Sunday, Nov. 27, 1949.

Shaarei Shomayim, often called "the St. Clair Shul," was then, as it is now, a prominent Orthodox synagogue whose membership included a galaxy of leading "baalei-batim" of Jewish Toronto. Its spiritual leader was Rabbi Judah Washer, whose name appears several times on the program and who delivered the dedicatory address, in the presence, among others, of the lieutenant governor of Ontario, Ray Lawson, the president of the University of Toronto, Sidney Smith, and Rabbi Samuel Belkin, president of Yeshiva University in New York. Rabbi Abraham Price, head of the Yeshiva Torah Chaim, delivered the invocation. My name also appears (which is probably the reason that I kept the program), and so do the names of two of my colleagues, fellow graduates of the yeshiva: Rabbi Abraham Kelman and Rabbi Gedalia Felder. David A. Newman, a highly respected lawyer and stalwart of the younger Orthodox generation, was chairman of the event.

Now comes the surprise.

Among the active participants in the "religious service" was not only Rabbi Reuben Slonim, one of the first Conservative rabbis in Toronto, who offered the "Prayer for King and Country," but also the spiritual leader of Holy Blossom Temple, Rabbi Abraham L. Feinberg, who led the Congregation in the responsive reading of Psalm XXX! Rabbi Feinberg was known for his classical Reform orientation. And if that was not enough, the closing benediction was given by Rabbi Aaron Kamerling, also a Reform rabbi, who worked with Jewish students at U of T.

Can you imagine such an example of trans-denominational toleration in our community today? Would an Orthodox rabbi dare to demonstrate such religious inclusiveness? Yet that was the strength of our unity at the time.

Religion can divide and religion can unite. I think back with a great deal of melancholy to the days when our commonality outweighed divisiveness. It was not due to a lack of commitment to belief. It was due to greater love and deeper understanding.

Alas, what was, was. Can it ever be again?

Rabbi Schild is rabbi emeritus of Adath Israel Congregation in Toronto.

Asking teens, 'Are you a Zionist?'

In collaboration with professors Alex Pomson and Howie Deitcher of Hebrew University, for the past two years, I have been listening to Jewish high school students describe their views on Israel and Zionism. In total, we've interviewed and videoed nearly 100 day school students as they recount their developing relationship with Israel and the various factors that weigh into forming their opinions.

We've learned more than I can possibly recount in this column, but I will use this space to tackle one particularly intriguing issue.

day schools, many travel frequently to Israel, read news from Israel, and attend Zionist camps and youth movements. So why do they either when asked if they're Zionists?

Listening closely, we found a difference in the way they view a Zionist's engagement with Israel and their own.

In defining a Zionist, they described politically motivated engagement – public activity motivated by instrumental considerations. For example, Mike stated, "A Zionist is someone... who always supports Israel no matter what, who ensures that Israel, and acts to ensure that Israel, has security and stability in the world and will always be around for Jews to go to. They will build it up, they will protect it, and they will advocate for it."

Class Act
Daniel Held

When defining their own relationship to Israel, however they spoke of a civically motivated engagement – public activity motivated by a sense of duty, regardless of the outcomes.

When Jordana describes a Zionist she says, "They go to rallies. They express their opinions. They tell it to other people and try to convince them that [Israelis] deserves their own state." But in describing her own relationship to Israel she states, "To me, Israel is a home for me, personally, and I think for every Jew... I think the whole beauty of Israel is that when people go to Israel, even if they don't want to make aliyah, I think they still feel some kind of connection to the land, so although it's not necessarily their home-home, it's still a type of home for them."

Initially we were puzzled and troubled that so many highly engaged Jewish teenagers would waver when it came to defining themselves as Zionists.

But upon closer inspection, we realized that their hesitation is not an indication of a distanced relationship to Israel, but a nuanced understanding of their relationships to Israel vis-a-vis their conception of Zionism. By understanding these two underlying relationships to Israel – politically and civically motivated – we can begin to address what and how we teach about Israel and Zionism and tailor our pedagogy to develop the desired deep and rich relationships.

Program helps students become leaders

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

In an effort to keep Jewish student leaders involved in Jewish community life following graduation, UJA of Greater Toronto's Community Connect launched a pilot program at the University of Western Ontario called CORE.

CORE – which stands for capacity, opportunity, return, engage – is a leadership development initiative that aims to transition Jewish student leaders into Jewish community leaders once they leave campus and enter the workforce.

The pilot program, which involves staff and students from Western Hillel and Israel on Campus (IOC), is also meant to reach out to students uninterested in or unaffiliated with organized Jewish campus life, said Western Hillel's executive director Naomi Mazer.

"When they came to us with the idea to have Western be the pilot campus for the launch of this leadership rollout, we were very excited about that," Mazer said.

She suspects Western was chosen as the site for the pilot because the campus is residential, meaning many students come from Toronto and live on campus.

Mazer said the strategy is to use the CORE objectives to implement a program called the Campus Entrepreneurs Initiative (CEI).

Through CEI, Hillel hires student interns with leadership skills – particularly Jewish students who are not involved in Jewish campus life – in the hope that they will connect with other Jewish students who operate beyond the Hillel bubble.

"We're going to use CORE to focus on the needs of those engagement interns, but we're going to open it up to other leadership students who are doing similar type of work in other clubs as well," Mazer explained.

"As interns they're responsible for creating 40 new relationships and having Jewish discussions and tracking the Jewish journeys of students and go through leadership development training along the way."

Monthly sessions will be provided to any student interested in Jewish leadership, with a focus on networking and relationship building.

Stephen Shedletsky, a consultant who worked with UJA's National Young Leadership assistant director Lior Cyngiser to help develop the program, said he would have wanted a program like this when he was a Western student.

"When I was at Western, I was involved in starting a Jewish fraternity there, Sigma Alpha Mu," Shedletsky said.

He said it was through his involvement with the Jewish fraternity that he formed relationships with Hillel staff, including Mazer.

Although he grew up in a family that he considers more traditionally Jewish than religious, he said when he attended Western, "I really resonated with Jewish values. When I came home, I didn't really have that outlet anymore. I had the outlet of friends and going out to Jew-dos and what-not, but I didn't have a meaningful outlet to get involved in community or religion."

Once he graduated from Western's Richard Ivey School of Business in 2009 and entered the corporate world, he said he didn't feel a sense of fulfillment.

"So I decided to go it on my own."

He started a business coaching organization and, soon after, connected with UJA Federation to serve as a consultant for the pilot program.

"It was so appealing because I had such a rich and meaningful experience as a Jewish leader on campus... and I saw this as such a fantastic opportunity to approach a student like me and say, 'Hey, when you come back to Toronto and you're looking for a way to contribute to a meaningful cause, here's how you can develop yourself as a Jew and a leader.'"

In addition to focusing on relationship building, team dynamics is another priority.

"You operate both as an individual and as a team working together and also across other organizations... I think that's something the Jewish community in general can benefit from," Shedletsky said.

Rabbi Dr. Nachum Berlat appointed Senior Chaplain Emeritus and Scholar-in-Residence at Baycrest Health Sciences

Baycrest Health Sciences, a global leader in innovations in aging and brain health, is pleased to announce the appointment of Rabbi Dr. Nachum Berlat to Senior Chaplain Emeritus and Scholar-in-Residence.

Rabbi Dr. Berlat has touched the lives of so many during his 25 years as Baycrest's Director of Spiritual Care, providing friendship, religious and spiritual support to residents, clients, families, healthcare professionals, Baycrest staff, volunteers and visitors of all faiths.

At an organizational level, he has led the transformation of pastoral care at Baycrest into an integrated professional program aligned with medicine, nursing, social work and other disciplines.

Rabbi Dr. Berlat's scholarship in pastoral counseling, Jewish history and Jewish bioethics is complemented by mediation skills and a charismatic warmth and good humor that has helped him connect with people of all backgrounds, and foster relationship-building within the community.

Teaching others has been fundamental to his work at Baycrest. He has trained chaplains of all faiths and denominations to provide service at Baycrest Hospital and the Apotex Centre, Jewish Home for the Aged, led Sabbath and Jewish Holy Day services, and contributed to Jewish Education and Cultural and Heritage programs at Baycrest in countless ways.

This month Rabbi Dr. Berlat retires from his director position to begin his new role which will include continued involvement in teaching activities with Baycrest's Medical Residency Program and with nursing and allied health disciplines, leading cultural and spiritual programs at Baycrest, and providing spiritual support to clients and families in a volunteer capacity.

On behalf of Baycrest and our community, we extend our heartfelt appreciation to Rabbi Dr. Berlat for his immeasurable contributions to our cultural and spiritual programs. We look forward to his continued counsel.

BGU president works for gender equality

Carmi a member of 'class' of 1948

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Rivka Carmi was a "child of the state," an Israeli who was born in 1948, the year David Ben-Gurion proclaimed Israel's statehood in the teeth of Arab threats to invade the newly established nation.

"We were told we had a special role to play in Israel's development," said Carmi, a native of Zichron Yaakov, one of the first Jewish settlements in pre-state Israel. "I took it seriously."

Carmi, the daughter of European immigrants who arrived in Palestine in the early 1930s, has the distinction of being one of the most distinguished members of the "class" of 1948.

A physician who has campaigned for gender equality in Israel, she was the first woman to be the president of an Israeli university. She was appointed president of Ben-Gurion University of the Negev six years ago. Based in Be'er Sheva, it is Israel's newest institution of higher learning.

Prior to this, as dean of Ben-Gurion

University's faculty of health sciences, she was the first female director of an Israeli medical school.

Two years ago, in yet another breakthrough, she became the first woman to serve as chair of the Committee of University Heads in Israel.

"I never dreamed of becoming the president of a university," said Carmi, who was recently in Toronto on an official visit on behalf of Canadian Associates of Ben-Gurion University of the Negev. "I wanted to go back to my clinical work and research."

Although she was flattered to be offered the position, Carmi was not even sure she wanted it. Nor was she certain she was the right person for the job.

But after deciding that the presidency would be the fulfilment of a life-long dream and ambition to help develop the Negev, which accounts for two-thirds of Israel's pre-1967 land mass but holds only 10 per cent of its population, she relented.

For Carmi, Ben-Gurion University, founded in 1969 to promote the development of the Negev, is the place to be. "I came here in 1975 with a mission," said Carmi, a graduate of the Hebrew University's Hadassah Medical School. "I wanted to be part of Ben-Gurion University's new medical school, which was only two years old."

Carmi's mother, Ziporah, a Polish Jew who admired Ben-Gurion, Israel's first prime minister, was delighted when she joined the Soroka University Medical Center and the faculty of the university.

"Ben-Gurion was a central figure in my childhood," she said. "Ben-Gurion's vision of settling the Negev was a serious concept for me. The future of Israel was and is in the Negev. It's the only region where Israel can physically expand as a country. I expect its population to double within about a generation, though we must preserve its natural beauty. What is Zionism if not settling the Negev? If we can conquer the Negev, we can do anything."

Since becoming its president, Carmi has worked to upgrade its academic stature, both in Israel and abroad, and make it an integral and indispensable part of Be'er Sheva, the gateway to the Negev.

"My goal is to invest in research and getting the university much more involved in Be'er Sheva and in the development of the Negev," she explained in an interview.

The university has a student body of more than 20,000 students, and employs about 5,000 teachers, researchers and administrative and support workers.

More than half of its students are enrolled in undergraduate courses, but in the future, four out of 10 students will be on the post-graduate level, Carmi said.

Close to 1,300 of its students are Israeli Arabs, of whom about half are Bedouin. During her presidency, Carmi has made special efforts to bring in Arab students.

Spread over five campuses in six different schools, the university has eight research institutes, including the Jacob Blaustein Institutes for Desert Research, and a host of interdisciplinary research centres from the Ben-Gurion National Solar Energy Center to the S. Daniel Abraham International Center for Health and Nutrition.

At present, the university is building an advanced technology park, a collaborative effort between industry and academia that is expected to provide employment opportunities in the Negev.

Its first building is scheduled to open next June, and the entire complex will be up and running within eight to 10 years, Carmi said. "It will have a tremendous impact on the Negev," she noted.

A leader in desert research, the university played a major role in developing drip irrigation, a cutting edge technique, and has made important contributions to dry land agriculture, solar energy, water purification and desalination and the cultivation of dry-climate exotic fruits.

"Our research is geared to turning the desert into a place that can sustain life," she said. "In this respect, we have really managed to make the desert bloom."

The university, too, has striven to promote the advancement of the Negev in terms of education, culture and health.

She added, "Without us, Be'er Sheva would be a small village. By our mere existence, the city has been positively affected."

The university has been affected by government cutbacks in funding, Carmi said, but is trying to work around them.

Although she no longer has the time to conduct hands-on research in such fields as neonatology and medical genetics, she remains a consultant and a scientific reviewer for various international journals and funding agencies.

A believer in free speech and a middle-of-the-roader in her political beliefs, Carmi defended the right of Neve Gordon, a faculty member, to publicly support the boycott, divestment and sanctions movement against Israel and to brand Israel as an apartheid state.

"He's entitled to these views as an individual," she said. "But I loathe his views."

Carmi's term of office ends in May 2014, but she is still contemplating whether to accept an extension. "I really don't know yet," said Carmi, the mother of a 34-year-old daughter who works as a management consultant in New York City.

Whatever her decision may be, Carmi can rest assured that her career has already had a significant effect on the cause of gender equality in Israel.

"There is a lot of light at the end of the tunnel," she said, suggesting that another Israeli university may soon be on the cusp of appointing a woman as its next president. "This would be really good news," she said, savouring the prospect.

Arabs urged to copy Israel to succeed

Diane Koven
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Israel is locked in conflict because the Arab world would rather destroy the Jewish state than copy it, Rabbi Daniel Gordis said in his keynote address at the kickoff of the Jewish Federation of Ottawa's annual campaign.

"Israel models something to the world, something the Palestinians ought to copy, not destroy," said Rabbi Gordis, the Koret Distinguished Fellow at the Shalem Center in Jerusalem.

In spite of the many and constant threats to its existence, what Israel has accomplished in its relatively short history is something to be emulated by the very neighbours who seek to destroy it, he said.

Rabbi Gordis, an American who moved to Israel in 1998, is a prolific author and dynamic speaker. His address was based on his latest book, The Promise of Israel: Why its Seemingly Greatest Weakness is Actually its Greatest Strength.

Describing the many personal challenges and fears involved with day-to-day life in Israel, Rabbi Gordis posed the question, "Is it worth it?"

"I would like to propose to you this evening that that conversation about whether or not it is worth it – and, more important, why it is worth it – is a conversation we are not having... the conversation about Zionism has effectively been hijacked, and we have allowed it to be hijacked," he said.

In the past, when Israel was thought of only as a place of refuge, and the Jews considered underdogs, the conversation was very different, he added.

Today's Jews are comfortable discussing the Arab Spring, "but there is nothing we can do about what happens in Egypt... or in Syria," he said.

"We can affect how it is that Jews think about Israel... to begin to frame a conversation in which I remind myself why does the country matter... Our obligation tonight and beyond, as people who care deeply about Israel, is to re-frame the conversation."

Because of the State of Israel, Jews around the world can stand tall and hold our heads up, he said. Israel today has much to offer the world and should serve as a model to other countries, an example of what can be accomplished by such a small country even in the midst of tremendous stress and turmoil.

The campaign kickoff, held Sept. 9 at Centrepointhe Theatre, was attended by Miriam Ziv, Israel's ambassador to Canada, as well as local MP Pierre Poilievre. Ian and Randi Sherman and their three sons, Jonathan, Matthew and Adam, chaired the event.

The 2013 annual campaign chair Michael Landau and women's division chair Susan Viner-Vered, urged members of the community to become involved as both volunteers and donors.

99-year-old Winnipegger wins medal for volunteerism

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — When Sophie Shinewald first received the call informing her that she was to be a recipient of the Queen's Diamond Jubilee Medal for volunteerism, she thought it was a joke and almost hung up.

"[But] I was very excited to have received the honour," says the still active and energetic Winnipeg Jewish senior, who, at 99, was the oldest recipient of the award. "My children and grandchildren were very proud."

The new medal, created last year to mark Queen Elizabeth II's 60th anniversary on the throne, was presented to her Aug. 22 by her member of Parliament, Kevin Lamoureux.

Shinewald noted that she was nominated for the award by her grandson, Benjamin Shinewald, a lawyer in Toronto who served as national executive director of and general counsel to Canadian Jewish Congress from 2008 until last year. (He is currently president and CEO of the Building Owners and Managers Association of Canada.)

"I didn't know anything about it," Sophie Shinewald said.

She said her first volunteering experience came when she was 12 and her older sister volunteered her to teach sewing to students at the Peretz School.

Shinewald is a qualified teacher who worked in the fur business in her early years. After marriage, when her two children started school, she began a 16-year career as a supply teacher in north Winnipeg. She also served as a member of the school board at Luxton School while her children were attending school there.

It was after her husband died 25 years ago that Shinewald began volunteering in earnest. Her volunteer work has focused mainly on two areas. For the past 20 years, she has manned the front desk at the Gwen Sectar Creative Retirement Centre, a program for seniors.

"For many years, I used to go in early on Tuesdays and put up the tables for bridge, too," she said. "I have really enjoyed all the people I have gotten to know at the Gwen Sectar."

Twelve years ago, Shinewald sold her house and moved into the Rosh Pina Co-op, a largely Jewish seniors apartment block affiliated with the nearby Etz Chayim Synagogue (formerly Rosh Pina). For many years, she took it upon herself to organize movie nights Saturday evenings for the residents of the block and some outside visitors.

"Every week, I would take the bus to the local library and select a DVD to show," she says. "A lot of people over the years enjoyed the evening."

The movie nights came to an end about 18 months ago when the block's caretaker suddenly died. By that time, the number of people attending had dwindled, and Shinewald decided to "retire" from the project.

Shinewald attributes her good health and energy to good genes. She is looking forward to her 100th birthday next April.

Columnist accuses Israel of pulling Canada's strings

Canada's sudden decision earlier this month to sever diplomatic ties with Iran elicited a huge amount of media attention.

Reports, analyses and commentaries were everywhere, and their quality varied greatly.

On what we might call a higher level of analysis, CBC's Wendy Mesley interviewed three experts – Aaron David Miller, Hooman Majd and Janice Stein – on the Sept. 9 The National about the reasons behind Canada's move.

Stein, director of the Munk School of Global Affairs, provided a three-part explanation:

- The Canadian embassy in Tehran had been unable to function. Embassy staff had been "totally shut out" by Iran and were "absolutely unable" to do anything for Canadians in Iranian jails.
- There was a growing concern here about the Iranian embassy's "monitoring" of Iranian Canadians.
- The Harper government wanted to send a clear message, following the meeting in Tehran earlier this month of the 120-member Non-Aligned Movement, that the decision of the international community to isolate Iran must be taken seriously.

That was the considered judgment of one of Canada's most respected academics.

By contrast, on the lower level of analysis (if that word even applies here) was the unidimensional view of Toronto Star columnist and Ryerson University journalism professor Tony Burman. Canada cut its ties with Iran because, he claimed, Canada takes its marching orders from Israel.

As Burman put it: "Canada's abrupt actions against Iran seem to confirm that the Harper government's outsourcing of Canada's Middle East policy to Jerusalem is now complete."

According to Burman it's not an assessment of our national interests and Iran's outrageous behaviour that drives our Middle East policy – at least not in this case. Rather it's that we're a puppet at the end of Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's strings. "There is little else to conclude," Burman wrote, meaning there is nothing else to conclude. Such is the depth of his analysis.

ask "what in God's name" led us to lose our "honest broker" standing? – apparently forgetting that he'd already answered his own question: Israel.

Did it not occur to Burman that his thesis, unsupported by any actual evidence, is an insult to Canadians? Apparently not.

Burman's presumptuousness is not uncharacteristic.

Last January he boldly, if mistakenly, predicted that, "within the next several months," having entrapped U.S. President Barack Obama into joining it, Israel would launch a war on Iran. To Burman, the clever entanglements Israel foists on other countries, great and medium powers alike, seem boundless.

To be taken more seriously is the Globe and Mail's Doug Saunders. In his Sept. 8 column, he was also critical of Canada's decision, downplaying the Iranian nuclear threat by claiming that even Benny Gantz, Israel's chief of the armed forces, doesn't believe that Iran is "pursuing" nuclear weapons.

Saunders got this wrong. Gantz certainly believes that the Iranian leadership is pursuing a nuclear weapons capacity that is very dangerous, and not only to Israel. Gantz argues only that Iran has not yet "decided" to go the final step of producing the weapons themselves.

As Gantz explained a few months ago in a much-discussed Ha'aretz interview: "If the supreme religious leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei wants, he will advance it to the acquisition of a nuclear bomb, but the decision must first be taken. It will happen if Khamenei judges that he is invulnerable to a response."

In contrast to both Burman and Saunders was Margaret Wente in the Sept. 11 Globe. She acknowledged the grave risk that a nuclear Iran poses and commended the principled stand that our government took in breaking ties: "Instead of doing nothing," she wrote, "Canada is using what moral force it has to condemn a pariah state. Iran probably doesn't care. But other countries will take note, and some might even follow suit. It's possible that the force of international opinion might even affect Iran's behaviour. So good on us. We did the right thing."

THE MICHAEL JOHN HERMAN LECTURES 2012

ZIONISM

EIGHT TOUGH QUESTIONS FOR TODAY

by Prof. David Novak, University of Toronto

Thursdays 7:30 pm at Beth Tzedec Congregation

A series of eight presentations previewing chapters in his forthcoming book on a new philosophy of Zionism.

September 27 Zionism: Is it Jewish?

October 4 Secular Zionism: Is it enough?

October 11 Democracy: Is it compatible with Judaism?

October 18 Jews: The chosen people?

November 1 Land: Is it holy?

November 15 Residence: Is it required?

November 22 Others: A place for non-Jews?

November 29 End-game: realpolitik or salvation?

Plan to attend any or all of the sessions; each lecture covers an independent topic Rabbi Dr. David Novak, prolific author and acclaimed scholar, holds the J. Richard and Dorothy Shiff Chair of Jewish Studies as Professor of Religion and Philosophy in the University of Toronto, where he is a member of University College and the Joint Centre for Bioethics.

The Michael John Herman Lectures are sponsored by Mary Ellen Herman and her children in memory of their husband and father, a committed life-long learner and a questioning lover of philosophy, Judaism and Israel.

Open to all. Refreshments will be served. Admission free.

שישאר בינינו

גידי קורן וחברים

זה הזמן שכואב:

בחדש דצמבר 2003, כשלושה חדשים אחרי שמלאו לו שמונים שנה, התברר למשורר נתן יונתן כי חלה במחלה חשוכת מרפא וימינו ספורים. מאז ועד מועד פטירתו במרץ 2004, הוא כתב כשלושה-ארבעה שירים, בהם נתן ביטוי רב עוצמה להתמודדותו עם המוות שקרב ובא. "זה הזמן שכואב" הוא אחד מהם. השיר פורסם כשלוש שנים לאחר מותו בספר שירי העזבון שלו ("שירים שנשארו"), הוצאת ידיעות אחרונות (2007). זהו שיר שמבטא מכאוב חסר תקנה בשל מרידה בלתי נמנעת. בין גבר ואשה שאוהבים עד כלות ומנסים להיאחז זה בזה כל עוד נפשו. את השיר העצוב והמדהים הזה הלחנתי מספר ימים אחרי שהספר הגיע לידי, בנחשול של כאב של מי שמתגעגע לחבר קרוב שלא ישוב עוד.

בחינו של נתן יונתן הולחנו כ 200 משיריו ("חופים הם לפעמים", "אם זה קוצים כואב").
השיר " זה הזמן שכואב" יוצא לרדיו וליוטיוב השבוע, לרגל ראש השנה וכחלק מטקס הענקת פרס נתן יונתן, וזה השיר החדש הראשון של נתן יונתן שיוצא לרדיו בהפקה מלאה מאז מותו.

שום דבר לא יהיה כמו שהיה.

וכל מה שאבד לא יקום לתחייה.

אבל משהו עז ומאוד אמיתי

מחבק בי אותך. מחבק בך אותך.

לא. האושר איננו זקוק למלים.

רק אני רעבה למילות אהבה.

כך אמרת דמעת. לא אמרתי מילה.

רק בכיתי בלי קול והייתי שלך.

זה הזמן האוהי. שכואב לי נורא.

כמו פרפר שנלכד בעיגול המנונה.

משוה שרציתי כל כך לא קרה.

ולמי יש עוד כוח לשוב חזרה?

אהובה. אם נזכרנו אולי מאוחר.

אם הלך לו היום. עוד נשאר קצת מחר.

ודמעה ששתקה על לחיך היפה.

היא כאילו לוחשת מילת אהבה.

אני רוצה להקדיש את השיר הזה לשנה החדשה. אני רוצה ללמוד ממנו שהזמן קצר, ושצריך להיות ולאחוב עכשיו, כאילו כל יום הוא האחרון שלנו. ומתי שרק אפשר – להיות טוב לאנשים אחרים, לנסות להבין מה כואב להם ואיך לעשות את החיים שנשארו לנו יותר טובים, ואפילו קצת. אבל שישאר בינינו.

אתם יכולים למצוא את השיר ביוטיוב:

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto

2012

Jewish Education

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Centre for Jewish Education (CJE) is dedicated to strengthening, enriching and promoting the quality of Jewish education across the Greater Toronto Area. A top priority of UJA Federation, the CJE provides services and support to over 70 day and supplementary schools, 1,700 educators and 15,000 students. In fact, this year alone, UJA has allocated $12,241,000 for Jewish education. Devoted to fortifying and advancing quality Jewish education, the Centre for Jewish Education continues to build the capacity for a sustaining Jewish day school educational system, and to develop more educational portals and opportunities for enhancing Jewish supplementary school programs.

TUITION

$10,120,000

Tuition Subsidies and Operating Grants

$9,850,000

These subsidies and grants enable 14 funded Jewish day schools to welcome children from lower income families into their classes. Over 2,200 of 8,000 students are receiving the benefits of these grants and subsidies. This is the largest tuition subsidy to Jewish day schools from a Jewish Federation in North America, and demonstrates UJA Federation's ongoing commitment to Jewish education. This includes the support of the Julia and Henry Koschitzky Day School Grant which promotes Hebrew and Bible literacy.

Diverse Learning Program

$270,000

UJA Federation's Diverse Learning Program supports former students of the She'arim Hebrew Day School with diverse learning needs to reach their potential in a Jewish environment. The program provides children with leading edge educational approaches and support in a communal environment at Associated Hebrew Schools.

CJE OPERATIONS

$819,000

This includes the CJE administrative costs including operational staffing, shared services, occupancy and office expenses.

EDUCATION PROGRAMS AND SERVICES

$1,302,000

Day and Supplementary Schools Services

$80,500

Services include: Israel Engagement Programs, Zimriyah, Rikudiyah, Bible Contest, School Fairs, Jewish Media Centre and Creative Writing Contest.

Supplementary Schools

$580,000

These funds are used to support supplementary schools with program grants and a new initiative to improve quality and expand outreach.

Special Education

$560,000

These funds are used to support Jewish day schools to provide student assessments, social work services, educational remediation services and consultations. This allows the schools to address special learning needs of the school population.

Third Party Evaluation Process for Day Schools

$42,500

This is a new initiative to establish and promote the highest quality of education programs.

Other Services

$39,000

Professional development programs, Insurance, Jewish Educational Service of North America.

Sukkahville 2012 finalists

Creative sukkot help less fortunate

Compiled by CIN Staff

Winning designs for this year's second annual Sukkahville competition will be displayed at a ceremony and family event, Sept.

30, noon to 4 p.m., at Mel Lastman Square.

The competition is sponsored by Kehilla Residential Programme, a UJA Federation of Greater Toronto agency that helps those who need affordable housing in the Jewish community.

Funds raised through sponsorships will be used to supplement Kehilla's new rental assistance program, which bridges the gap between market rates and what the poor in the Jewish community can afford to pay.

From 42 submissions, which came in from architects, artists, design specialists and students from as far away as India and Tunisia, five finalists have been chosen by a panel of judges, and given a stipend with which to erect their structure.

Daphne Dow, Houston, Texas; Sukkanoe by Gregory Marinic, Nicolas Herrera, Kevin Pham, Michelangelo Sabatino and Serge Ambrose, New York, N.Y. and Houston, Texas; Woven Sukkah by Ion Popian of San Francisco.

The five sukkot will be put up for sale at the end of the exhibit, and each will carry a retail price of $3,600, the amount that each submission received from the organization to build the structure.

The event at Mel Lastman Square will include the awards ceremony, a hands-on build a sukkah opportunity by Habitat for Humanity, and music by Klezconnection.

Visitors can meet the artists and walk through the structures, which will remain on display until Oct. 3.

TV doc's new show answers viewers' questions

Cara Stern

Special to The CJN

You might wonder how Marla Shapiro does it all.

In addition to her full-time medical practice, her reporting work for CTV News and Canada AM, lecturing at universities, and much more, she's launching a new television show called Dr. Marla and Friends.

The show, which premieres Sept. 24, answers viewers' health questions and delivers the latest news in the world of health and medicine.

"Health care is about a partnership between the patient and the health-care provider," Shapiro says. "The best way to be a member of your health-care team is to be empowered by knowledge."

Each week, Shapiro will delve into recent health-care news, and give viewers insight into tests and other situations that they might never experience unless they were undergoing treatment themselves, she says, using a sleep study as an example. "What is a sleep study? What does it look like?"

She will also discuss medical misconceptions and host health panels featuring experts who will debate and discuss important issues.

The viewers will drive the topics, she says, adding that she expects a huge viewership, consisting of people from all ages. "Regardless of how old you are or how young you are, that this will be the place to go to get your questions answered."

Although Shapiro has had plenty of airtime to discuss health issues, this show gives her the chance to delve deeper and offer the viewers more information.

"This is a new opportunity to reach out to the viewers in a longer format," she says.

So far, she has received a wide variety of questions from the public. "Is tap water as good as bottled water? If I get a shingles vaccine, can I give my children chicken pox? Why do my ears pop on a plane?" she says. "They're really varied and they're lots of fun."

Many viewers will remember when Shapiro faced her own health issues back in 2004, when she was diagnosed with breast cancer. In 2006, Shapiro released Life in the Balance, a book detailing her life as she fought the illness.

She says it had a built-in audience – unfortunately, she adds – because so many people are diagnosed with breast cancer each year. The book gives insight into how her family dealt with the diagnoses.

"It's as much about life balance as it is about my breast cancer experience," she says. She also released a documentary called Run Your Own Race, which covered with the same period of her life.

Shapiro has been a medical correspondent for CTV News for many years, as well as a reporter for Canada AM. She writes a weekly health blog and an "Ask Dr. Marla" column. She is the founding editor of ParentsCanada, which publishes parenting magazines. She also works as an associate professor at the University of Toronto and lectures at universities across the country.

Her work doesn't stop there though. She sits on a number of boards, including Baycrest, Cancer Care Ontario, and the Canadian Menopause Society, and she boasts she is the only Canadian to sit on the board for the North American Menopause Society.

Not to mention her full-time medical practice. She says it's not too difficult to manage it all, because it ultimately comes down to doing what she loves.

"It doesn't really feel like work," she says. "It just feels like great fun to do the things I do."

In addition to mastering the art of multitasking, Shapiro says organization is the trick to balancing so many different jobs – as well as a lack of need for sleep.

"I do sleep, though," she insists, laughing. "It's organization and passion that keeps me going."

She credits her parents for shaping her values of hard work. "My family values and the way I was raised had a huge impact in terms of who I am and how I run my own life, and what my personal values are," she says.

She says she hopes she has transferred the same values to her children. "My family and I are very active in UJA and in the community," she says, adding that it's important to give back through involvement, rather than simply through financial donations.

Her 28-year-old daughter is involved in the Jewish community, particularly through her career at Bialik Hebrew Day School, and her 17-year-old son has shown a well-rounded commitment to his community, she says.

Her family life has been quite busy, too, with the arrival of the person Shapiro calls the most exciting member of her family: her first grandson, who is now six months old.

She says her patients remind her how lucky she is to be able to do her work, which she considers a great honour and privilege.

"I think how enormously lucky I am to have parents who encouraged my education," she says. "I've been so lucky to have an incredible academic experience both in Montreal and in Toronto, and I don't take what I do lightly at all."

These are some of the values that will go into the new show, she says. "A great respect for our viewer and really taking into account who they are and what our values are, and doing the best job we can to meet the values of the show and keep it as up to date and current as we can."

Spin-A-Thon to raise funds for cancer research

Susan Minuk

Special to The CJN

What started as a personal healing journey in memory of his father, the late Rami Peled, has become a philanthropic mission to help fight cancer.

Rami Peled died at age 58 in January 2011, after an eight-year battle against a rare form of stomach cancer. Now, his son, Tom, a 24-year-old Israeli, has partnered with the Israel Cancer Research Fund (ICRF) and is biking across the United States to raise funds for cancer research.

Tom Peled felt he could best work through his bereavement last year by moving out of his comfort zone and challenging himself physically and mentally. So, last summer, he embarked on a 3,000-mile bike trip through six European countries.

After his European tour, he formed an international cycling charity, Bike for the Fight (BFF), of which he is now CEO, as a way to honour his late father and fight the disease that robbed them of so many precious years together, by raising awareness and financial support for ICRF.

As part of this year's bike-trip fundraiser, ICRF Toronto is sponsoring its first annual BFF Spin-A-Thon on Sept 23.

Peled began his 3,000-mile American journey with a team of three others Aug. 1 in Los Angeles, continuing through several U.S. states. He will end his trek in New York City Oct. 24. At the end of each day's ride, Peled shares his personal story with those he meets. He hopes to encourage others to join his cause by donating money or accompanying him on part of his trip.

"One can't measure with one's eyes the rewards that biking across the country has provided. The people and friendships made along the way [are like] planting seeds. We may not see the effect immediately, but suddenly we learn of acts of kindness that have sprouted," Peled said in an interview.

Tom Peled

Thirty-five spinners will be taking on the challenge at the ICRF BFF two-hour Spin-A-Thon. Each spinner will have a personal fundraising page. The goal is to raise a total of $20,000.

Peled will be taking a break in his bike trip to fly to Toronto to participate in the BFF Spin-A-Thon, which will be followed by a reception to celebrate his accomplishments hosted by Jeff Bly, executive board member of ICRF.

Not a spinner? Let Tom spin for you by signing up to be a virtual spinner. Registration is $36, with a suggested minimum fundraising goal of $500. Prizes are awarded for top fundraisers. Registration is still open.

Peled, who is a student at the Lauder School of Government, Diplomacy and Strategy at the IDC college in Israel, has already attracted a number of partners and co-sponsors, including El Al Airlines, Hillel in Israel, Maccabiah 2013, the Embassy of Israel and Microsoft Israel, which has developed a facebook and smartphone app for the project where supporters can track Peled's progress. (www.facebook.com/Bike-ForTheFight)

Peled has received support from a number of Israeli leaders, including Israeli President Shimon Peres and Jerusalem Mayor Nir Barkat.

Peled and his team – Eran Rozen, 24, Roey Peleg, 27, and film student Luca Seres, 23, who is making a documentary about the journey – are all students who have chosen to quit their summer jobs and devote their energy and time into this project. They will be starting school one week late this year, as well.

Asked if they celebrate Shabbat on the road, Peled said, "Our team's core principle is to not bike on Shabbat... We celebrated Shabbat at the Chabad in Boulder City, Colo., with some 150 college students who were excited to hear about our project."

He feels that their message is getting through. "After biking some 75 miles each day, we open our computers. We are very moved by emails from people who have lost a loved one to cancer, and who tell us that they have been inspired by us and want to make a difference by donating to our cause. These rewards are what keep the forward momentum," he said.

Peled is selling blue BFF wristbands and hopes to make BFF a brand for the Jewish world. "I want to encourage others to follow my lead," he said.

All funds collected will be donated to ICRF, a North American organization with six chapters, including one in Toronto and one in Montreal. Founded in 1975, ICRF gives grants to top Israeli cancer researchers in scientific institutions across Israel.

To date, BFF has raised $40,000 – almost half of Peled's $100,000 goal. The ICRF BFF Spin-A-Thon in Toronto takes place from 12 to 2 p.m. at Mayfair Club West. For more information and to register, visit bff.icrf.ca.

Caring for caregivers

Program teaches how to cope when loved ones have dementia

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Living with Dementia is getting ready to start up again this October. This unique program, which was launched in the spring, is in partnership with Holy Blossom Temple and Mount Sinai Hospital's Reitman Centre.

The program is the first satellite community-based program coming out of the partnership, and is aimed at family members who are caring for loved ones with dementia.

Gerry Richman, who co-leads the program with Esther Zeiler and Sandy Atlin, said that it offers a component for both caregivers and their loved ones.

An adult educator and professional life coach, Richman said she has an interest in helping those in the community who are often overlooked, "and family members and caregivers need a lot more attention. They are trying to cope with [a situation] that is very new to them. We help them develop skills to help cope with the challenge."

The seeds for the partnership were planted, said Richman, when Dr. Joel Sadavoy, head of geriatric psychiatry at the Reitman Centre for Alzheimer's support and training, and head of community psychiatry services at Mount Sinai, came to speak to a group at Holy Blossom about the Reitman Centre's Carers program, which provides practical, skill-based tools and emotional support for family members caring for loved ones with dementia.

A concurrent arts-based program for cognitive and interpersonal stimulation is provided for the family member with dementia.

"We discussed the possibility of a satellite program at Holy Blossom, and after months of meetings and conversations, we recruited volunteer staff who were trained by Mount Sinai," said Richman.

They launched the 10-week program in the spring, and offered simultaneous sessions with caregivers and their loved ones.

Part of the program for caregivers includes role-playing based on their own challenging situations. "We ask them to journal their situations, and bring them to each session," said Richman.

After a two-hour session, she said, everyone comes together, and they have a Judaic component to the program. "We have a rabbi or cantor come in and they lead us in music and prayer."

She said the spring session was "highly successful. Participants bonded, and discovered they were not alone."

Sadavoy said that caregivers have never been identified as a population in need. "Dementia care will fail unless the caregiver can adequately manage their loved one at home. Almost everyone with dementia has disturbances, which disrupt relationships and impair communication. Caregivers are highly vulnerable to breakdown under the burden of care."

For information on the program, email templemail@holyblossom.org.

Break the fast with make-ahead recipes

Randy Fingrut
Special to The CJN

After a day of fasting, nothing is better than an inviting, nourishing meal that takes a minimum of effort. These appetizing Yom Kippur recipes can be made in advance so that you can spend less time in the kitchen and more in the company of friends and family.

At the end of the fast, serve a tray of freshly sliced apples with honey. Meanwhile, you can have everything else ready and on the table within an hour. The Cheese and Vegetable Strata is packed with carbohydrates and protein, so there is no need to pair it with meat or fish to satisfy your hunger when breaking the fast. Enjoy this selection of delectable Yom Kippur recipes

APPLE AND RAISIN SALAD

Dressing

2 tbsp. canola oil

1/2 cup white balsamic vinegar
1/2 cup water
1/4 cup golden raisins (soak in warm water for one hour, drain)
2 tbsp. honey
1 large clove garlic
1 tsp. basil
1 tsp. oregano
zest of one lemon
1 tbsp. lemon juice

Combine all ingredients in a blender or food processor and process on high speed until smooth. Refrigerate. Stir or shake well before using.

Salad

5 cups romaine lettuce, chopped
2 cups shredded red cabbage
2 Granny Smith apples, chopped
1 cup shredded carrot
1/2 cup chickpeas, (from a tin, rinsed and drained)
1/4 cup chopped walnuts
1/4 cup raisins

Cheese and Vegetable Strata

Toss salad with dressing just before serving.

CHEESE AND VEGETABLE STRATA

A strata is a layered casserole dish similar to a quiche or a frittata. The difference is that the ingredients are not all mixed together. A strata is made with an egg mixture poured over layers of bread. The casserole needs to be left between one hour and overnight before baking. It is then served warm as an entrée.

8 eggs, beaten
2 1/2 cups skim milk
2 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
4-5 garlic cloves, minced
1 tsp. dried oregano
1/2 tsp. salt
1/4 tsp. pepper
1/2 tsp. dry mustard
1 tbsp. dried parsley
1 loaf of challah, crusts removed
3 cups shredded cheese, part mozzarella, part cheddar
3 medium-large zucchinis, thinly sliced
1-2 red peppers, thinly sliced
1 1/2 tbsp. chopped chives

Spray a 15x10-inch, 4-quart, Pyrex baking dish with canola oil or olive oil. In a large bowl, combine eggs, milk, oil, garlic, oregano, salt, pepper, mustard and parsley. Place one layer of bread in dish, top it with one-third of the zucchini slices and then cover that with one-third of the cheese. Spoon about one-third of the egg mixture over this first layer.

Repeat this step for second and third layers. Arrange red pepper slices over top and sprinkle with remaining cheese and chives. Using a pastry scraper or a large sharp knife, score the strata. Push right down to the bottom of the Pyrex dish, forming 12-16 pieces.

Cover tightly with plastic wrap and refrigerate overnight. Bake strata in a 350-degree oven for one hour. Then, using the pastry scraper or knife, cut along score lines and remove individual pieces from dish with a large offset spatula.

*If the challah is very thickly sliced, make Strata in two layers rather than three.

MALIBU COCONUT CHEESECAKE

9- or 10- in. springform pan
3 cups light cream cheese circle of parchment paper
1 cup sugar
12 oz. package of shortbread cookies
1 cup coconut
1/4 cup coconut rum
1 tbsp. sugar
3 eggs
1/2 cup light coconut milk
3 tbsp. margarine, softened
1 cup coconut, toasted*

Crust: Spray springform pan with cooking spray and line with parchment paper. Process cookies in food processor, or place in a large plastic bag and crush with a rolling pin to make crumbs. Add coconut, 1 tbsp. sugar and margarine, and mix. Press crumb mixture firmly into base of spring form and up the sides. Refrigerate.

Preheat oven to 350.

Filling: Mix cheese and sugar until smooth. Add eggs, rum and coconut milk and blend well. Pour into crust.

Fill an ovenproof dish with water and place on lower rack of oven. Place cheesecake on middle rack. Bake for 50 to 60 minutes. Edges will be set, but centre will wobble. Turn off heat and let cheesecake sit in oven with door partly open for 1 hour. Refrigerate. Remove cheesecake from springform pan when cold, at least 4 hours or overnight. Top with toasted coconut.

*To toast coconut: preheat oven to 300. Place coconut on a parchment paper-lined baking sheet. Bake approximately 10 minutes until coconut becomes golden in colour. Watch carefully as it burns quickly.

Anti-Islam filmmaker is Egyptian Christian

JTA

NEW YORK — He's not a Jew.

At least that's the latest on the man behind the anti-Islam film Innocence of Muslims, which has fuelled attacks on U.S. diplomatic installations in Libya, Egypt and Yemen. The Libya attack left the country's U.S. ambassador, J. Christopher Stevens, and three other diplomats dead.

The filmmaker appears to be an Egyptian Christian rather than an Israeli Jew, as he had claimed in interviews.

The Associated Press tracked down an Egyptian Coptic Christian living in Southern California who admitted to involvement with the film's logistics, and whose middle name and a known alias closely resemble the apparently fake name — Sam Bacile — used by the filmmaker.

A federal law enforcement official, speaking on condition of anonymity, told the AP on Thursday that authorities had concluded the 55-year-old Egyptian man, Nakoula Basseley Nakoula, was the key figure behind the film.

A 14-minute trailer for the crudely produced film ridiculing Islam's Prophet Muhammad and posted to YouTube with an Arabic translation has been cited as the reason for the outbreak of violence at U.S. diplomatic posts in the Middle East.

On Tuesday night, heavily armed Islamists stormed the U.S. Consulate in the Libyan city of Benghazi, killing Stevens and three members of his staff. Fighters claimed that their actions were driven by anger at the film, though U.S. officials believe the assault may have been pre-planned.

The deadly attack followed angry protests at the U.S. Embassy in Cairo, where rioters breached the compound's walls and destroyed its American flag.

On Thursday, protesters stormed the grounds of the U.S. Embassy in Yemen's capital city of Sana'a. There were also more anti-American demonstrations in Cairo and other capitals of Muslim countries. In the wake of the initial violence, several media outlets interviewed a California man who gave his name as Sam Bacile who reportedly had produced, directed and written Innocence of Muslims. The man said he was an Israeli-American real estate developer hoping to help Israel with the film, which he said was financed with $5 million by 100 Jewish donors.

While media outlets, including JTA, widely repeated his claims, they quickly came under scrutiny. There appears to have been no such person by that name involved in film or real estate, nor was that name known in California's Jewish and Israeli communities. A high-ranking Israeli official in Los Angeles told JTA on Wednesday that extensive inquiries among Hollywood insiders and members of the local Israeli community failed to turn up a single person who knew a Sam Bacile.

Baguettes joining pita in Israel

JTA

NETANYA, Israel — On a street off Independence Square, storefronts advertise La Creperie Galette, Nouvel'hair and Agence Immobiliere.

Families lounging under parasols at cafe tables chat in French and enjoy a sunny afternoon. Nearby, the Mediterranean waves lap up against tranquil beaches.

But in the local language, Independence Square is called not La Place de l'Independence but Kikar Ha'atzmaut. And this scene takes place not in Nice or Cannes but in Netanya, a coastal Israeli city about halfway between Haifa and Tel Aviv.

The scene is not unique.

From Netanya to Jerusalem and all the way south to Eilat, Israel's French community is growing and leaving its mark on Israeli society. Some 2,000 French Jews have arrived in Israel annually since 2009.

French immigration first spiked above 2,000 in 2002 and reached nearly 3,000 in 2005. The French Consulate in Tel Aviv estimates that as many as 150,000 French Jews live in Israel, although only about 70,000 are officially known to the consulate. Many split their time between Israel and France.

"The kids were small and we said, 'It's better to come' to Israel, said Avraham Doukhan, a French real estate broker who made aliyah 15 years ago. Doukhan says the younger generation of French immigrants is generally integrating well.

"The kids, they aren't French, they're Israeli. They know Hebrew better than French," he said.

With 600,000 Jews, France is the world's third largest Jewish community behind Israel and the United States. The immigration levels of the past few years mean that one of every 300 French Jews is making aliyah — more than five times the annual rate of U.S. residents moving to Israel. French Israelis say that antisemitism in France motivates Jews to come to Israel, as the growing French community here becomes increasingly attractive.

"They began to understand that they are less than one per cent of the [French] population and Arabs are larger," said Avi Zana, director of Ami, an Israeli organization that aids French immigrants. "The only option is to close ranks in the community, to express themselves less as Jews. Jews feel comfortable, safer in Israel."

Attacks against Jews and Jewish sites have made the country's Jewish community insecure, from the crashing of stolen cars into a synagogue in 2002, through the abduction and subsequent death of Ilan Halimi, 23, in 2006 and to the Toulouse shooting at a Jewish school in March in which four Jews were killed. The SPCJ, the French Jewish community's protection service, documented more than 90 antisemitic incidents in the 10 days that followed the Toulouse shooting.

In 2004, then-Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon called for French Jews to immigrate en masse to Israel, causing controversy in France. But Christophe Bigot, the French ambassador to Israel, praised France's fight against antisemitism and said that positive feelings, rather than fear of attacks, should drive immigration to Israel.

"Real immigration should be driven by Zionism, religious beliefs, familial reasons, but not by fear," Bigot said. "On the French side we've taken every action to ensure the security of the French Jewish community. That doesn't mean it's always successful, of course."

The French Consulate has taken notice of the growing expatriate community here and provides myriad services including financial assistance, French-Israeli schools and cultural events such as film festivals or theatre.

For all its growth, though, the French community in Israel has remained insular, settling in concentrated areas and establishing centers of French culture, as in Netanya's Independence Square. Many French citizens here speak no Hebrew.

"They want to be like they are in France, to not be mixed," said Barbara, 26, who moved to Israel from France eight years ago. "If they stay with only the people they know, they won't know how the state works," she said, asking that her last name be withheld because of job concerns.

French immigrants' behavior, however, is not unusual among immigrant populations in Israel, as Russian and American expatriate communities also have formed.

Also, French Jews do not feel completely rooted to life here, expatriates say. France is a quick flight away, and a salary in euros rather than shekels is tempting. And unlike Russian or Ethiopian immigrants, French Jews can return to a safe, democratic country.

Many French Jews thus have chosen to purchase apartments here for a potential future immigration, as well as for vacations. Coastal cities have proven popular for French buyers both because they recall the French coast and they already have large French communities. The purchases, however, may have made buying a home more difficult for Israelis, according to real estate agents in Netanya.

French immigrants feel "like the city is theirs, but it's not theirs," said Myriam Luzon, a French resident of Netanya. "They do what they want, but there are Israelis here, too."

A few French Jews in Netanya said they expect the majority of France's Jews to move to Israel within the next decade. Zana said the community already here does not get enough respect from native-born Israelis.

"The Israeli people laugh at the French accent," said Zana, who has lived here for 35 years. "They look at them as tourists. The Israeli approach is not right, not responsible."

But Zana hopes that French Israelis, who tend to be traditionally observant and politically to the right, will become more involved in Israeli politics and society. He notes that they have already contributed much to Israel, from a solid work ethic to a democratic tradition and better taste in food.

"The boulangerie, patisserie, all of the fine food, that's not Ethiopian or Russian influence, it's French," he said. "The falafel is not more Israeli than the baguette. It just got to Israel before the baguette. I don't think in another 20 years we'll be eating baguettes less than pita."

Population nears 8 million

Israel's population is nearing 8 million, up almost 100,000 from the end of 2011, according to data released on the eve of Rosh Hashanah. The Central Bureau of Statistics reported the population of Israel stands at approximately 7,933,200. At the end of 2011, it was at 7,837 million. The new figure includes approximately 5,978,600 Jews, or 75.4 per cent of the population, and about 1,636,600 Arabs, or 20.6 per cent. The 318,000 people categorized as "others" include 203,000 foreign workers, of whom some 60,000 are African migrants.

The first Hebrew printing of the popular novel Fifty Shades of Grey sold out in a day. The 50,000 copies of the book by British author E.L. James, which went on sale Sept. 9, were sold out by the next morning.

The Israeli business daily Globes reported. The book, the first of a trilogy and initially published in English in June 2011, has sold 40 million copies in the United States and 10 million in Britain, according to Globes. The novel details a sadomasochistic relationship between a female student and an older businessman.

2nd-most educated country

Israel has the second-highest percentage of adults with a post-high school degree among member states of the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD), according to an OECD education report released last week. The Education at a Glance 2012 study revealed that 46 per cent of Israeli adults have a university degree, the second-highest percentage after Canada, at 51 per cent. The OECD average is 31 per cent. In Russia, which isn't an OECD nation, 54 per cent of adults have obtained a higher degree. Israel also has a very high percentage of high school graduates, standing at 92 per cent in 2010, compared to the OECD average of 84 per cent.

Meeting would send message of partnership

The Israeli law came on Sept. 11, when Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu complained, at a press conference with his Bulgarian counterpart, that "the world tells Israel to wait because there is still time [to thwart Iran by non-military means]. And I ask – wait for what? Until when? Those in the international community who refuse to put red lines before Iran don't have a moral right to place a red light before Israel."

Netanyahu said "the world," but it was the United States – whose Secretary of State Hillary Clinton had two days earlier dismissed the idea of giving Iran an ultimatum on halting its program – that he was accusing of "moral" failure.

The Iranian challenge is more acute for Israel than it is for the United States. We are closer and more immediately threatened, and our capacity to inflict substantive military damage on Iran's nuclear facilities is more limited than that of the United States. Our "window of opportunity" to stop Iran thus closes sooner than does America's.

But this U.S. administration has vowed to stop Iran attaining nuclear weapons. It has argued that an Israeli strike could not destroy the Iranian program but would prompt Iran to rebuild and accelerate its drive to the bomb, and would shatter the sanctions effort. Many wise and experienced Israeli figures share those assessments and muster additional arguments against an Israeli attack.

The Israeli government may not be confident that a second-term President Barack Obama or a first-term president Mitt Romney would actually send in the bombers. It may dispute the American assessment that there would be sufficient time for a U.S.-led coalition to act if Iran made a breakout bid for the bomb. It may feel that a solo Israeli strike is necessitated, now, even though this might merely delay an Iranian bomb – because who knows what else might change if a delay of a year or two can be achieved. But asserting that America's contrary position is not "moral" is unjustified and counterproductive, the more so when the prime minister has repeatedly acknowledged that the United States recognizes Israel's sovereign right to take the decisions it feels necessary to ensure its security.

The Israeli tactic that has played out over recent months – whereby Israel has worked strenuously to create the impression that it is poised to strike at Iran – galvanized the international community, focused attention on Iran and may have helped intensify sanctions pressure. But it now appears to have been overplayed. But in addition to the Americans, almost the entire leadership of the Israeli security establishment, past and present, is cautioning against military action at this stage.

For Israel to allow that window of military opportunity to close – as the window will, we are told by the security chiefs, sometime in the next few months – is to subcontract the nation's security to the United States. Doing so may be Israel's best option. It may prove to be a catastrophic mistake. Whichever is the case, it would require an immense – existential – degree of faith and trust, by Israel, in an ally that has proved supremely steadfast, but that ultimately acts according to the balance of a vast array of its interests, not only Israel's.

The prime minister has said several times that he will not place Israel's security in the hands of its friends, even the best of them. But ultimately he may conclude that he has to do precisely that. As he agonizes over this most fateful of decisions, phone conversations with the leader of that best of friends are doubtless helpful. But the phone is no substitute for face-to-face conversation.

For the president not to find an hour to meet with the prime minister during his U.S. trip, and for the prime minister not to adjust his schedule as necessary – whether in New York or Washington, D.C., or anywhere else – would be unforgivable.

However much they may dislike each other, mistrust each other, privately accuse each other of narrow and unbecoming political machinations, what other meeting on the presidential schedule could possibly take precedence over a tête-à-tête with the prime minister of a major ally whose small country is being threatened with destruction and whom you are imploring to hold his fire and place his nation's destiny in your hands?

It is surely not beyond the skills of the keepers of the presidential and prime ministerial diaries to find that treasured hour early one morning or late one night – or to apologetically shift or cancel a previously scheduled Obama meeting with a world leader whose nation's demise is not being sought daily by the would-be nuclear Islamists.

A meeting, at this critical juncture, would give leaders who are responsible for the well-being of millions of people the opportunity to explore in person central aspects of the life-and-death decisions they are weighing right now on behalf of those millions.

And crucially, too, after the unfortunate, unnecessary exchanges of derogatory rhetoric, an Obama-Netanyahu meeting would send out a clear and important message of U.S.-Israel unity, co-ordination and partnership – a message to Americans, to Israelis and to the Iranians.

Are you an heir?

60,000 assets of Holocaust victims were located in Israel and are waiting to be claimed

Thousands of Jews across Europe invested in pre-state Israel before WWII. These pre-war Jews believed in the dream of a Jewish State, so they opened bank accounts and bought stocks, bonds and real estate. Many tragically perished at the hands of the Nazis. Their investments did not.

60,000 of these assets have been located by HASHAVA - The Holocaust Restitution Company of Israel. HASHAVA is now seeking rightful heirs, many of whom live in North America.

Israel transfers money to PA

JTA

JERUSALEM — Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu ordered the transfer of some $63 million to the Palestinian Authority to help ease its economic crisis.

The transfer on Sept. 11 came after Netanyahu consulted on the issue with Finance Minister Yuval Steinitz, and then asked his special envoy, Isaac Molho, to co-ordinate with the Palestinian leadership, according to a statement from the Prime Minister's Office. The money is an advance on tax revenues collected for the PA by Israel.

"We are working on several fronts in order to help the Palestinian Authority cope with its economic problems," Netanyahu said on Sept. 11.

"We have made several changes in the taxation agreements. We are advancing certain transfers. We have also helped with Palestinian workers and with a series of other steps in order to make things easier for them.

"Of course, there is a global reality and it is also related to the internal management of every economy, but for our part we are making efforts to help the Palestinian Authority survive this crisis. I hope that they will succeed in doing so. This is in our common interest."

Palestinians have been staging demonstrations in the streets of the West Bank recently to protest the extreme economic hardship. The protests turned violent and destructive on Sept. 10, with thousands of protesters burning tires and attacking police in Hebron and Nablus. Protesters also reportedly smashed the windows of the municipal building and a police station in Hebron. Palestinian taxi, truck and bus drivers staged a one-day strike on Sept. 10. Civil servants did not receive paycheques for the month of August.

PA Prime Minister Salam Fayad announced measures to ease the economic hardship, including lowering the value-added tax and prices on diesel, gas and kerosene. Israeli officials are concerned that the unrest over economics and frustration with the Palestinian leadership could turn into a third intifadah directed at Israel, Reuters reported.

Palestinians in Ramallah demonstrate against the high cost of living. The signs read, "Why does our government force us to rummage for food? No to raising prices."

Solomon Schechter

ACADÉMIE • ACADEMY

המדרשה ע"ש שניאור זלמן סכטר

Principal

Solomon Schechter Academy, located in Montreal, is seeking a dedicated and enthusiastic professional educator/administrator to fill the role of Principal with the appointment to be ideally effective by June 2013.

Originally founded in 1969 and accredited by CAIS, Solomon Schechter Academy is a dynamic, co-educational, Jewish day school that offers a well-balanced, exceptional academic program and challenges its students to think critically in three languages. Serving over 600 students from Junior Pre-K through Grade 6, the Academy provides excellence in Judaic and general studies, and a rich array of extracurricular activities to lay the foundation for a lifetime of learning, enriched with traditions and values according to Conservative Judaism. Its education process is a vibrant partnership between students, parents and educators that builds confidence, teaches respect, encourages creativity, and instills a strong sense of responsibility for the community. Israel and humankind for today and tomorrow. Additional information about Solomon Schechter Academy is available at www.solomonschechter.ca.

Reporting to the Head of School, the Principal will ensure that the Academy meets and exceeds its standards of academic excellence by becoming a proactive and key member of its senior management team. He/she will supervise and support the faculty, have the ability to implement innovative teaching practices and continue the evolution of the school by being responsible for all matters relating to pedagogy, faculty engagement and evaluation, and curriculum. The Principal will liaise with parents and other constituencies, and work closely with Admissions and Student Services.

The successful candidate will share Solomon Schechter Academy's strong commitment to excellence in education and to a partnership with Montreal's Jewish community. As an experienced leader with a proven track record of outstanding achievements in education, he/she will possess a visionary outlook of teaching and learning, successful administrative experience and exceptional team building capabilities. Strong educational credentials, an understanding of a co-educational independent school environment, and the ability to establish a positive rapport with young people are required qualities. Experience in an independent school and the ability to communicate in French and/or Hebrew will be considered strong assets.

The Search Committee will begin its review of candidates immediately and will continue until the position is filled. Please respond electronically, in confidence, with a letter of introduction and curriculum vitae that includes the names of three references (who will not be contacted without the consent of the applicant) to the Academy's consultant:

Chris Stevens remembered

Philip Podolsky
Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — American Ambassador to Libya Chris Stevens, killed along with three other embassy staffers in Benghazi where protesters stormed the U.S. Consulate Sept. 11, was a noble person, harbouring deep empathy for both sides of the Arab-Israeli conflict, said those who knew him during his stint as political section chief at the U.S. Consulate in Jerusalem.

Stevens was killed when gunmen stormed the U.S. Consulate in Benghazi in what officials now believe was a planned terror attack.

Ehud Yaari, Israel's Channel 2 Arab affairs analyst, described the late envoy as a likable person and one of the most talented American diplomats of his generation.

Attorney Daniel Seidemann, an expert on Jerusalem, knew Stevens well and cultivated a friendship with him. "This was a man everyone loved, the intrigues and machinations of the world of diplomacy notwithstanding," he told Ynet news.

Stevens, who was fluent in French and Arabic, reportedly "fell in love" with the Middle East when he taught English as a Peace Corps volunteer in Morocco in the 1980s. His other overseas assignments included Damascus, Cairo and Riyadh.

"If there is such a thing as a noble American, it was he. He was able to sit in a room with Israelis and Palestinians and to empathize with both sides," Seidemann said. "He had an ability to see the bigger picture, and he was very open-minded. Israel was never just a job for him. He had a connection with it, he was committed to the Middle East."

According to the U.S. State Department, Stevens is the eighth U.S. ambassador to be killed in the line of duty.

A bumper harvest of books from all over

Bill Gladstone
Special to The CJN

When Beth Kaplan's Finding the Jewish Shakespeare: The Life and Legacy of Jacob Gordin first came out in hardcover several years ago, a review in these pages lauded it as a "wonderful and meticulously researched book" and concluded: "Although Finding the Jewish Shakespeare does not convince us that Gordin deserves the epithet of 'Jewish Shakespeare,' it easily demonstrates that he has found the biographer he deserves, and shall certainly find no better."

A great-granddaughter of Gordin, Toronto resident Beth Kaplan wrote the book as a labour of love and used it as her master's thesis in creative writing. Also praised by Aaron Lansky, Tony Kushner and other notables, the book was recently released in paperback by Syracuse University Press, making it accessible to a new audience of readers. Finding the Jewish Shakespeare should be essential reading for everyone interested in Yiddish theatre, past and present.

Beth Kaplan lives in a heritage home in Cabbagetown and teaches memoir and personal essay writing at both the University of Toronto and Ryerson University. She maintains a blog of her creative writing (www.bethkaplan.ca) and recently published Yours Truly: a Book of the Blog, a collection of her online pieces. The book came into being after some of her readers suggested she put her online chronicle into more permanent form. "Wouldn't that defeat the purpose? I wondered. A blog's advantage is its fluid immediacy; could that up-to-the-minute zap translate to print? And yet, though I love and depend on my little white laptop MacZine, books will always mean much more. A book is a perfect package of thought and feeling, just the right heft to slip into a pocket, open on the beach or in the bathtub, read in bed. The only battery a book needs is the reader's brain."

The author writes of her own personal world. She discusses art, literature, music, politics, writing and other topics. The prose offers realistic characters and incidents. Although her entries won't appeal to a universal audience and may be of most interest to a limited range of readers, Kaplan writes well. Niche books like this one may be the future of book publishing.

Just as good things often come in small packages, good books often come from small presses. Consider The Old Blue Couch and Other Stories, a collection of seven short stories from Ottawa poet-writer Seymour Mayne. Published by Ronald P. Frye & Co., these stories are small in scope but well put together.

The title story, for example, concerns the eponymous sofa that was spirited away from the author's front porch in the dead of night by persons unknown. Trying to undo their larcenous deed, the same persons returned the old blue couch to its former resting place in broad daylight. The message? Even thieves have consciences.

From Inanna Publications of Toronto comes Barbara Klein-Muskkrat Then & Now, a collection of a dozen short stories by Sharon Abron Drache, formerly of Ottawa, now back in her hometown of Toronto. These linked stories combine memoir writing and fiction in interesting and unusual ways.

The title piece, Reaching for Mordecai Richler, is so unmistakably about the real Richler that Drache evidently saw no point in cloaking him in a "roman-a-clef"-type literary disguise. This realistic Richler has been pulled into Drache's fictitious world, a realm that likely parallels Drache's own but actually belongs to her alter ego, Klein-Muskkrat. Although the blurred line between memoir and fiction is often disconcerting, one appreciates Drache's subtle satire of the various literary personalities she is jibing, herself included.

I know of Toronto-based Ethel Harris as a fine abstract painter. Her recent poetry volume, Tremolo, is my first encounter with her poems (Hummingbird Press). They are direct, moving, and surprisingly good. The theme is fall, winter, spring – that is, the coming death of a loved one, the blackness when it occurs, and the slow revitalization of new shoots of life pushing through the soil. The book is dedicated to the poet's late husband, Milt Harris (1927-2005).

Kudos also to 97-year-old poet Lawrence Sandy, a resident of The Terraces at Baycrest, who recently published Winter's Tales, a collection of poems, after joining a poetry class four years ago. (Wordrunner Press)

Blockade: The Story of Jewish Immigration to Palestine (1933-1948) by Gerald Zidenberg is an impressive work short stories by Sharon Abron Drache

Barbara
KLEIN-MUSKRAT
then & now

of historical nonfiction. Published by Authorhouse, the book tells the heroic story of Jewish immigration to British Mandate Palestine, detailing the many ships that participated in this struggle from tiny sailboats to the ill-fated Surma to the legendary Exodus 1947. The author is a retired Toronto pharmacist who earned an MA in history late in life.

Toronto author Pearl Goodman has written Peril: From Jackboots to Jack Benny, in which she reconciles her handed-down experience as a child of survivors with her experience growing up in Toronto the Good. Or, in her own words: "The unison beat of thousands of pairs of jackboots clicking and echoing on pavement so many years before my time, and the little girl that I was, listening to the insipid whining of Jack Benny on TV." (Bridgeross)

I have yet to read Toronto author Anne Dublin's most recent novel, The Baby Experiment (Dundurn) but if it's anything like her previous award-winning titles (Bobbie Rosenfeld: The Olympian Who Could Do Everything, or The Orphan Rescue) it's bound to be good. A work of historical fiction for young people, The Baby Experiment focuses on a 14-year-old Jewish girl in 18th-century Hamburg who discovers a terrible secret at the orphanage where she works.

This column concludes with two more small-press titles, both written by this reviewer and both, in my humble opinion, deserving of note. The History of the Jewish Community of London Ontario (248 pages, hardcover) was published by Now and Then Books in 2011. The other title – The Story of Beth Lida Forest Hill Congregation: A Toronto Synagogue's First Century (1912-2012) – appeared from the same press this month to mark Beth Lida's 100th anniversary. 'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression"

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

HUMOURIST JONATHAN GOLDSTEIN TO APPEAR AT AUTHOR'S FESTIVAL

Montreal humourist and CBC radio host Jonathan Goldstein has a new book coming out – I'll Seize the Day Tomorrow – on the coattails of which he has been invited to appear at the 2012 International Festival of Authors at Toronto's Harbourfront (Oct. 16 to 31).

Goldstein writes a weekly self-satirical column in the National Post and recently hilariously divulged that he spent more than a decade invading people's privacy as a telemarketer while trying to further his writing career. His big break came in 2000 when he was hired to work as a producer on the popular American radio show This American Life. Several years later he began his own show, WireTap, for the CBC.

Besides the National Post, Goldstein has written for a score of publications including The Walrus and the New York Times. He is the author of several novels. Scheduled to be published by Penguin in October, I'll Seize the Day Tomorrow is a collection of short stories hilariously recounting the highs and lows of his last year in his 30s.

Goldstein is now famous enough to have his own Wikipedia entry, which relates that he also co-scripted Schmelvis: In Search of Elvis Presley's Roots. Featured in the Toronto Jewish Film Festival, the 2001 film followed a band of Jewish schlemiels who drive through the American Bible Belt and visit Israel attempting to document Presley's connections to Judaism (including, believe it or not, a Jewish great-grandmother). Ultimately the boys end up in a Christian revival meeting – just the sort of ironic humour that has become Goldstein's trademark schtick.

Goldstein reads from his new book and is interviewed at IFOA on Oct. 20, 9 p.m., along with his CBC colleagues Jian Ghomeshi and Nora Young. He also appears in a separate event at noon the same day. www.readings.org

Cinema of Sidney Lumet: Film maven Shlomo Schwartzberg discusses "Intelligent Art and Meticulous Craft -- The Social Cinema of Sidney Lumet," focusing on 12 Angry Men, The Pawnbroker and Network (with clips). Lumet's films "displayed a social conscience that still reverberates today in the Occupy Wall Street movement and in the corridors of political power." An extraordinary story of Holocaust survival

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

"It's an incredible story," said Tom Powers, a Toronto International Film Festival programmer a few minutes before No Place On Earth was screened last week.

He was not engaging in hyperbole.

Janet Tobias' 84-minute documentary film documents an amazing and unique tale of stamina, courage, grit and survival during the Holocaust.

For 511 days, from 1942 onward, 38 Jews from five extended families saved themselves from certain death at the hands of the Nazis by retreating into two gypsum caves in western Ukraine.

"Our situation was desperate," wrote one of the survivors, Esther Stermer in her memoirs, We Fight to Survive, published in 1960. "Where can we survive? Clearly, there was no place on earth for us."

Stermer, the resourceful matriarch of the family, devised the idea of hiding in a cave, knowing that it was their only hope of getting through the Nazi occupation unscathed.

Stermer and her family lived in the village of Korolowka. They planned to immigrate to Canada on Sept. 8, 1939, but with the outbreak of war, they were unable to leave.

When the Germans invaded the Soviet Union their lives were imperiled. Stermer, a strong and resolute woman, convinced her sister, Leiche Wexler, and her two sons to seek safety in a cave known as Verbeba. There they were joined by other Jews from the region.

Although they had candles and kerosene lanterns, they lived mostly in the dark, subsisting on dripping water from rocks and food bought or stolen from peasants.

In the spring of 1943, they were discovered by a German patrol, but most of them managed to escape through a secret exit.

Miraculously, the Stermers found another cave, the priest's grotto cave, in which to hide. Along with a group of other Jews, they remained in that cavernous cave until the Red Army liberated the area in April 1944.

"We beat the odds," says one of the survivors who lives in Montreal today.

By living underground for so long, they broke a world record for uninterrupted underground survival, a record that still stands.

Tobias, an American television journalist and producer who launched her career on CBS' 60 Minutes, got wind of the story a few years ago when a friend brought it to her attention.

Initially, she was reluctant to pursue the tip, she admitted. "There are so many great Holocaust dramas and documentaries that have been done."

She changed her mind after reading a National Geographic article by Chris Nicola, an avid American caver of Ukrainian ancestry who had explored the priest's grotto cave and had found objects there such as buttons and ladies' shoes. These artifacts belonged to the Jewish families who had found a haven there.

Nicola's account so aroused Tobias' interest that she met with him and the Stermers. "I just thought, 'This is really a special story about family and friendship and a belief in the faith to do the impossible.'"

Once Tobias, a history buff, was convinced the Stermers were good storytellers, she went ahead with the project, recruiting producer Rafael Marmor to coordinate it.

No Place On Earth unfolds through on-camera interviews, wartime footage and reenactments.

Tobias wanted to shoot the dramatic recreations in Ukraine, but could not due to practical issues. She and her colleagues looked for substitutes and settled on Hungary.

"We needed, from a cinematic standpoint, a location with caves which were visually appropriate, and one with nearby historical villages which would fit our story," she explained.

The caves had to be big enough so that the Hungarian actors could easily fit inside.

One of the most poignant moments in the film occurs when some of the survivors and their children and grandchildren return to the Verbeba cave in a sentimental journey.

Filmmaker Janet Tobias and Holocaust survivor Saul Stermer.

"The idea of bringing them back to this place would certainly stir up some strong emotions," she said.

Dark places usually repel people, but the Jews who found refuge in these caves considered them nothing less than heavenly havens.

"They were free people inside the caves," said Tobias. "This is a story about how heaven and hell trade places. They found safety in the caves. The monsters were outside. The world was turned upside down."

Tobias and her associates have received offers for theatrical distribution in the United States, but have yet to decide which one to accept.

She said that No Place On Earth will be broadcast on the History Channel after its theatrical debut.

Doc peeks into the secret world of the Shin Bet

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Dror Moreh's riveting documentary, The Gatekeepers, which screened at the Toronto International Film Festival, gives viewers an unprecedented peek into a usually secretive and murky world.

Six former directors of the Shin Bet, Israel's well-oiled internal intelligence agency, speak candidly about their jobs in counter-terrorism. They are surprisingly open as they discuss their missions and methods and express their personal views of the Arab-Israeli conflict.

"No one understands the conflict between Israel and the Palestinians better than these six men," said Moreh in an interview. "When they speak, leaders listen. They're highly respected and their views count."

He spent about 100 hours with them over a three-year period. "I was startled, but also thrilled, when they agreed to speak to me," said Moreh. "They were generous with their time and information. I thought they were as honest as they could be without revealing state secrets."

Not one former Shin Bet director declined to be interviewed, though one died before he could meet him.

Avraham Shalom (1980-1986), who was part of the Israeli undercover team that tracked down and kidnapped Nazi war criminal Adolf Eichmann in Argentina, says that morality has no place in the war against terrorism. A proponent of a two-state solution, he suggests that Israeli governments have generally not addressed the Palestinian issue seriously enough.

Shalom, forced to resign in the wake of an incident in which two Palestinian terrorists were killed after being captured alive, bemoans Israel's "brutal occupation" of the West Bank and talks about a "bleak and dark" future.

Yaakov Peri (1988-1995), who was instrumental in setting up a vast network of Palestinian informers and collaborators in the early years of Israel's occupation, admits that Israel did not foresee the first Palestinian uprising, which broke out in 1987, and claims it was a spontaneous rather than a manipulated manifestation.

Peri believes that Israel should have reached a political agreement with the Palestinians and withdrawn from the territories. He charges that a succession of Israeli governments "coddled" Jewish settlers and looked the other way as they built their settlements. After Yitzhak Rabin's assassination, he claims, Israel had no real desire to reach an accommodation with the Palestinian leadership.

Carmi Gillon (1994-1996), who shifted the Shin Bet's focus to Jewish terrorism, says that a plot by Jews to blow up the Dome of the Rock in eastern Jerusalem could have touched off a war between Israel and the Muslim world. Fearing that Jewish extremists wanted Rabin dead, Gillon advised the Israeli prime minister to wear a bullet-proof vest and increase his security detail. Rabin refused.

Ami Ayalon (1996-2000), whose task was to rehabilitate the Shin Bet after Rabin's murder, says he saw deep divisions and currents of hatred in Israeli society after that catastrophic event. Calling targeted assassinations of Palestinian leaders not necessarily effective, Ayalon says they may actually increase terrorism by radicalizing Palestinians.

Avi Dichter (2000-2005) led the agency after the eruption of the second intifadah, initiated the construction of the separation barrier and supervised the assassination of Hamas' most accomplished bomb maker. His observations on the dangers of "collateral damage" – the unintended deaths of innocent Palestinian civilians during Israeli raids – is instructive.

And Yuval Diskin (2005-2011), who destroyed Hamas' military infrastructure in the West Bank and perfected the doctrine of targeted assassinations, talks about the split-second decisions he was forced to make. He acknowledges the Shin Bet hit bottom in terms of effectiveness during the post-Oslo era.

In Moreh's judgment, Israelis like Shalom, Peri and Diskin are neither dovish nor hawkish. "They are realists," he said. "They know that, beyond a certain point, you can't achieve anything by military means."

He added, "They are the people in Israel with the greatest knowledge of the Palestinians, and the message they send is clear: the occupation has to stop."

Moreh claims that Ariel Sharon, the former Israeli prime minister, decided to withdraw unilaterally from the Gaza Strip after four former heads of the Shin Bet concluded that Israel's presence there was counterproductive and no longer in its national self-interest.

Moreh has a message for the Jewish community: "Listen to them. They understand the Arab-Israeli conflict better than politicians and journalists. Listen to them."

He is clearly glad that his interviewees liked The Gatekeepers. "They were happy with it," he said.

The 97-minute film is scheduled to open in theatres in Canada in 2013.

Musical looks at divorce with humour

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJN

Divorce is truly a laughing matter at Stage West Theatre Restaurant, at least from Sept. 20 to Nov. 25, when Divorce Party the Musical: The Hilarious Journey to Hell... and Back! takes to the stage.

One of the creators of the show is Mark Schwartz, who produced the Off-Broadway hit Menopause the Musical.

"Don't get mad – get everything!" is the mantra for Divorce Party the Musical.

The play is about Linda, played by local actor Allison J. Palmer, who is reeling from the demise of her marriage. She is content with sitting around eating another bowl of Chubby Hubby ice cream until her three friends throw her a divorce party.

"Divorce parties are a growing global trend – they're huge," says Amy Botwinick, who is one of the creators of the musical. A chiropractor, she is the author of Congratulations on Your Divorce: The Road to Finding Your Happily Ever.

Botwinick, once divorced, is now remarried to Boca Raton, Fla., attorney Gary Betensky, who is the president of the American Jewish Committee of Palm Beach County. He was also divorced, and between the two of them, the couple has six kids.

"They [divorces] are an important ritual that help people move powerfully forward with their lives. Over the last few decades, our views on many social issues have changed, and for me, right now divorce is centre stage and proud to show her face," Botwinick says. "Divorce used to be the evil stepchild who needed to be locked up in their room. Our parents and grandparents would whisper the big bad 'D' word."

"Now, entertainment banks on the latest and greatest marital breakup. Major newspapers and magazines write cover stories to chronicle how millions of families each year are adjusting to their divorce transition and beyond."

"And I think most married couples, if they are honest, think about divorce at least once during their relationship. This situation creates the perfect platform to tell the real-life stories of women, warts and all, and create some great comedy," Botwinick says.

She used her own divorce experience in her work. On the suggestion of her therapist, she started keeping a journal. "As I looked back at my entries, I thought this might be helpful to people because it is really helping me," she says. "That is what began this whole transition of becoming author, coach and playwright, from a chiropractor, which is really bizarre to me, but that's life."

After writing her first book, Congratulations On Your Divorce, Botwinick appeared on several national television programs in the United States. That attention helped her to begin a coaching career, helping women build their divorce team and giving them a strategy for how to get through this very difficult transition with a minimum amount of stress.

"That was serious business," Botwinick says. "But, what sprouted from that were workshops to help them tap into their power. In my interactions, they shared with me their stories, their successes and stuck points. It was so much fun for me to hear their triumphs, challenges and how they were able to spin some of the trauma drama into funny by looking at it in a different way, and that's a gift right there."

"What do women going through divorce really need... they need to laugh. I think you can squeeze humour from any difficult situation, and if you can do that, you can survive."

But Divorce Party the Musical isn't just for divorced people. Botwinick says that all of us who have had relationships will relate to the show. She wants the audience to come away with the realization that they're not alone and to get some courage, and to remember how important laughter is when they are going through a difficult situation. She'll be engaging the audience during "Talk Backs" at some performances at Stage West.

Botwinick says being Jewish is a part of who she is and how she grew up. "It's the good, the bad and the guilt. It is how I think and how I interpret the world. Being Jewish was a big part of the play for me, and invoking some Jewish humour into it. One of the characters in the play is Jewish – Hyman Finkelstein, named and based on my mother's first boyfriend."

The director and choreographer of Divorce Party the Musical is Jay Falzone, and the show's local cast includes Jewelle Blackman, Allison Sommerville, Jodi Butler and Scott Ahearn.

Art Modell, owner of Ravens, Browns, dies

JTA

BALTIMORE — Art Modell, former owner of the NFL's Baltimore Ravens and the Cleveland Browns, has died.

The 87-year-old Modell, a pioneer of the National Football League's partnership with television networks, died Sept. 6 of natural causes at Johns Hopkins Hospital.

Modell was well-known for his philanthropic activities and had been a supporter of The Associated: Jewish Community Federation of Baltimore. He also chaired a $100 million (all figures US) drive to build a cardiovascular tower for the Johns Hopkins Heart Institute. He and his wife, Patricia, donated $3.5 million to renovate the city's Lyric Opera House, which is now named for its benefactors.

"He really cared and cared deeply whether for Jews, Catholics or the plight of cities," Marc Terrill, president of The Associated, told JTA. "He simply cared about people, and his actions revealed his admirable character and he'll be missed."

Modell grew up in an Orthodox neighbourhood of Brooklyn, N.Y., in the 1920s and 1930s as the son of an electronics dealer who lost everything in the 1929 stock market crash. With his family destitute, Modell dropped out of high school to work as an electrician's helper at a New York shipyard, making 45 cents an hour.

After serving in the U.S. Army Air Corps during World War II, he returned to New York and rightly identified the nascent television industry as a strong growth market. He eventually moved from TV production to advertising.

In 1960, while working at a Madison Avenue advertising agency, the avid sports fan learned that the Cleveland Browns were for sale. Modell, then 35, jumped at the opportunity. He put down $3.93 million for the team and moved to Cleveland.

He was soon negotiating contracts for the NFL with television networks — serving as head of the NFL's television committee for 31 years — and pushed for the creation of Monday Night Football.

In 1996, Modell broke the heart of Browns fans by moving his team to Baltimore and changing its name to the Ravens.

The city of Cleveland went to court to block the move. The case ended with a $12-million settlement from Modell, including the promise that Modell would allow a new team to play in Cleveland with the Browns name and records.

Ironically, owner Robert Irsay had taken the Baltimore Colts from the city to Indianapolis in 1984, breaking the hearts of Baltimore fans.

In 1999, due to financial difficulties, Modell sold a minority interest in the Ravens to Steve Biscotti, who eventually bought the controlling interests in 2004. Patricia Modell died last October at 80.

Russia blows out Israel 4-0 in World Cup qualifier

The Times of Israel

TEL AVIV — Israel's national soccer team suffered one of the worst home defeats in its history last week, losing 4-0 to a vastly superior Russian national side coached by Fabio Capello.

Israel looked listless throughout the game — the second match of the 2014 FIFA World Cup campaign. The Israelis were unable to create goal-scoring opportunities and unwilling to compensate for Russia's superior play with effort and team spirit.

The Russians dismantled the Israeli defence with alarming ease time and again.

Alexander Kerzhakov scored twice in the first half, while Alexander Kokorin and substitute Viktor Fayzulin also scored for the Russians.

Many fans began to file out of Ramat Gan Stadium well before the final whistle.

Prior to the game the mood among the supporters was one of pessimism following the lacklustre performance last week in the away 1-1 draw with Azerbaijan, considered the group's weakest team, yet few predicted the extent of the fiasco.

Israel is still searching for its first win in Group F, which also includes Portugal, Luxembourg and Northern Ireland.

White Sox change game start due to Yom Kippur

JTA

CHICAGO — The start time of a Major League Baseball game between the Chicago White Sox and the Cleveland Indians has been changed due to Yom Kippur.

The Sept. 25 game will now start at 1:10 p.m. instead of 7:10 p.m., the Chicago White Sox organization announced Sept. 12. The game will be played in Chicago.

The time change came after a "significant number" of White Sox fans contacted the baseball club over the game's conflict with Yom Kippur, which begins at sunset on Sept. 25.

The White Sox and the Indians discussed the possibility of a time change and reached an agreement to move the game earlier, according to the team.

Chicago White Sox third baseman Kevin Youkilis, who is Jewish, told the Chicago Tribune that he was pleased with the switch.

"I guess that means I can play," Youkilis told the newspaper. "I really didn't know. I know there was talk that there was something about maybe changing it for the fans on that day. But it's a good thing for the playoff stretch."

Youkilis was traded to the White Sox in June by the Boston Red Sox.

He reportedly has never played a game on Yom Kippur.

This is not the first time a professional baseball game has been switched to accommodate Yom Kippur.

In 2009, the Yankees and Red Sox moved a Sept. 27 game from evening to afternoon after an outcry from Jewish fans of both teams.

'It's a challenging life'

Asked about his feelings on being posted to Canada, Schneeweiss said that on the one hand, growing up in a Commonwealth country has made his transition here relatively easy, since much of the culture, values and speaking patterns are similar.

But he said he immediately felt the presence of Canada's Jewish community of some 375,000 people - about 200,000 of whom live in the Toronto area - whereas in China, the community numbers in the low hundreds.

That difference is both inspiring and comforting, he said.

"When you get the nod for a job like this [in Canada], you immediately realize the size of the responsibility you have," Schneeweiss said. "The Canadian Jewish community stands tall among others and you can feel that strength."

On a personal level, he knows his job is sometimes hard on his family, but the rewards outweigh the detriments.

"It's a challenging life," he said. "You shlep your family around the world and force change on them... but it's rewarding and enriching as Zionists," he said.

His wife, a special needs teacher, is also still getting acclimatized and searching for potential work opportunities, while his twin children recently entered the Jewish school system in Toronto.

Aside from his excitement about figuring out the best way to contribute to the community and serve Israel during his term here, Schneeweiss said the Toronto posting also brings full circle a family history that traces back to World War II.

"My mom and grandmother were evacuated from England to Toronto in 1943. My grandmother, Eileen Jackson, lectured for Youth Aliyah while living here in those years," he said.

But many of the details about his grandmother's activities have become lost with the passage of time.

Schneeweiss said he's hoping to have time to do research in the city's old Jewish neighbourhoods to see if he can find out more about his grandmother.

In the meantime, he said as he settles into life in Toronto, he'll continue to listen to the concerns of the community, evaluate its strengths and weaknesses and decide on "where my skills will be best deployed."

Those skills, based on his background, will likely translate into an infusion of fresh anti-BDS strategies that the community can use to strengthen the case for Israel in Canada.

"We will find ways to articulate and re-articulate the Zionist message in the eyes of the world. We have to fend off those who are hostile to Israel's existence. But we do ourselves a disservice if we allow ourselves to be defined by that battle."

Grafstein launches online startups in news business

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

When Jerry Grafstein left the Senate after nearly 26 years, he knew he wanted to get back into the world of newspapers and media.

He'd been involved in a number of start-ups, including Citytv and YTV, and soon was involved in a consortium bid to take over CanWest assets including the National Post, the Gazette and the Ottawa Citizen.

When that venture fell through, he looked elsewhere, and at one point considered a suggestion that he launch a website geared to Liberal policy wonks. That seemed too narrow an audience, but it led to the creation a year and a half ago of the Wellington Street Post, an online news aggregator that offers content to people of all political stripes.

"That did reasonably well," Grafstein said. "We attracted a fair amount of attention."

Its success spawned the creation of a similar venture geared to those eager to consume news from and about Washington, called the Penn Ave Post.

More recently, Grafstein and his partner, Adam Miron of Ottawa, launched

Jerry Grafstein

HollyPost, which does for Hollywood what the other websites did for politicians in Canada and the United States.

The sites don't provide original content — there is no news staff beating the bushes for stories. Instead, sophisticated software developed by Miron and his team scans the online world for new content — largely from blogs — and puts it on their web pages. The site then hosts the content's headline and opening paragraph or so, sometimes including a photograph, along with a link to the original story.

The Penn Ave Post has been up for a few months and "it's doing well," Grafstein said.

HollyPost should do even better, he said, considering that the audience for news about Hollywood, its stars, its gossip and even its lawsuits, is global, he added.

Grafstein believes the "Post" model he's introduced is perfect for today's harried news consumer. Where once people leisurely sat down with newspapers to gather their information, they don't anymore. "The problem with papers is time," he says. "People don't have time." The software Miron developed "seeks the information, organizes it and puts it into order," doing what is traditionally an editor's job.

The software was road-tested against the New York Times. They found that a story originating out of the Middle East appeared on the Times' website 45 minutes after it did on theirs, Grafstein said.

He said he and Miron monitor the sites regularly throughout the day to ensure it's working properly.

Revenue is generated through ads. The Posts have an arrangement with Google and "they match up clients who want exposure," he said.

"Rates are determined by the number of eyeballs... and how long they stay. We find people are staying longer than we thought, so there's more value and that is part of a math formula for the ad rates."

So far the Wellington Street Post is breaking even and Grafstein said he expects Penn Ave Post to do the same "shortly."

He has greater expectations for profitability from HollyPost, because of its larger audience.

Grafstein has plans for further expansion. Sometime this month he expects to launch the China Star News and later the India Star News.

Further down the line, Grafstein said, he plans to indulge his passion for Jewish information and create the City of David Post, an aggregation of Jewish news from around the world.

"My passion is to take ideas and put them into action in the media," he said.

DIRECTOR OF MARKETING

UJA Federation is seeking a creative and flexible thinker with a deep understanding of fundraising marketing to be the Director of Marketing for the Annual Campaign. The successful candidate will not only create the strategic marketing plans, but also coordinate and manage large marketing projects from onset to successful completion. This self starter and excellent communicator will need to take initiative and maintain the marketing focus of the Annual Campaign while simultaneously working collaboratively with different teams.

Requirements:

- ▶ successful completion of post-secondary education;
- ▶ minimum 5-7 years of experience in the marketing field;
- ▶ ability to develop and implement strategic marketing plans;
- ▶ excellent communication skills, oral and written, with a good understanding of integrated marketing principles;
- ▶ experience using social media as a marketing tool;
- ▶ strong interpersonal skills;
- ▶ a self starter and creative thinker, with the ability to multi-task and meet deadlines.

We offer a competitive compensation and benefits package.

If you are an experienced Marketing professional with a passion for improving the lives of the vulnerable both here and in Israel, please submit your resume by October 1, 2012 to: hfinder-guttman@ujafed.org.

Only those considered for interview will be contacted.

Consortium considering sale of stake in massive gas field

Michal Shmulovich
The Times of Israel

TEL AVIV — A U.S.-Israeli consortium is considering selling up to 30 per cent of the huge Leviathan natural gas field off the coast of Israel.

The field — considered the country's largest fuel reserve — is located about 130 kilometres off Israel's coastline. It contains 17 trillion cubic feet of natural gas. Its discovery in 2010 was one of the world's biggest offshore discoveries in a decade.

The partnership in charge of exploration, Houston-based Noble Energy and Israeli partners Delek Drilling and Avner Oil & Gas Exploration, also hopes to find some 600 million barrels of oil beneath the gas.

The consortium said it received letters from "leading international companies" in an announcement to the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange, according to Reuters. The partners, who are seeking strategic partners to help finance the continued development of the gas field, are studying the offers and looking into starting negotiations.

HSBC has been hired to sell the 30 per cent stake, according to Nasdaq.

In May, the group had to stop drilling due to technical difficulties after it reached 6500 metres — the deepest-known penetration in the eastern Mediterranean Sea. With a higher cash flow, the project can be expected to begin producing gas in 2017.

Leviathan's discovery raised political tension between Israel and Lebanon because it is near the disputed borderline between the countries' territorial waters.

According to the U.S. Geological Survey, the subsea area, or the Levantine Basin, that runs northward from Egypt to Turkey contains more than 120 trillion cubic feet of natural gas — and Israeli waters account for some 40 per cent of that total. If the reserves are confirmed through discoveries, Israel, a country that currently imports all its fuel, stands to profit very handsomely.

Noble Energy has a 39.66 per cent share in the Leviathan gas field. Israel's Delek Group has a 45.34 per cent stake. Ratio Oil Exploration holds the remaining 15 per cent.

Measurement can lead to change

It is once again a time of beginnings. A new cycle for 5773 has begun. We are now in the High Holiday season, a time to reflect on our activities over the past year and a time to better understand how we'll move forward in the year to come.

We have just passed through the start of a new school year, as students, staff and teachers begin another cycle of teaching, learning and testing.

Soon we will begin a new cycle of Torah reading, starting with Bereshit. In a way, we're all starting over.

And when we start something new, perhaps it's a good time to measure and compare so we can find ways to improve.

A number of organizations in the Jewish community are moving into new facilities over the next few months.

Leo Baeck Day School recently opened its new southern campus on Arlington Avenue. The DANI Centre, which focuses on developing and nurturing independence of young adults with special needs, is in the midst of refurbishing a new space at the west end of the Garnet Williams Centre in Thornhill.

Moving into new spaces gives each organization a fresh opportunity to understand how their operations affect energy consumption and to start measuring and capturing information.

In most cases, when you move from a rental property to one you fully own, you gain the opportunity to be master of your own house. You get to control what you connect to, whether it be fixtures connected to water or devices connected to electricity and natural gas.

You get to control the amount of time devices are on or off, or how high or low you want your temperatures to be.

And with that control, you also have the opportunity to measure the impact of your operations, first from month to month and then, eventually, from year to year.

If you're in a rental situation, you may not end up with as much flexibility or motivation to control your consumption, or influence what devices are plugged in, how often they're used and what level they're set to.

Some landlords have the ability to have tenants separately metered for electricity and/or natural gas. With the ability to see consumption levels and the costs they drive, the tenant has a motivation to monitor, and adjust.

Without that knowledge, the tenant is usually subject to a formula based on the percentage of the building they occupy. How can recording these measurements month by month help to reduce consumption?

By measuring, you end up with a better chance to manage. By knowing facts, you gain a better understanding of what you can and can't control. Where possible, you can take steps to change energy consumption patterns – both what you use and how long you use it. Once you make those changes, you look for an impact in your monthly bills.

During the period from Rosh Hashanah to Yom Kippur, we become more introspective. We list out our sins and vow to do better. Whether with energy or personal actions, measurement can lead to a change on many levels.

Yom Kippur: shaky and anchored

Do you remember the jaunty talks we used to have late at night that inevitably ended with the question, "Do you believe in God?"

The conversation would continue, generally egged on by a person who might present one of Maimonides' proofs of God's existence: "Only one Being derives its existence from itself, and this Being is God. Since God is self-caused, everything that derives its existence from an external source must ultimately derive its existence from God."

At that point, some people would begin feeling shaky, almost panicky. They're the ones who naturally think in images or have been trained to see past the sinews and muscles that keep us stuck together. They're the ones who as children became nauseous upon learning that a mosquito deposits some of its saliva in our arm when it stings us. They're the ones who understood how Charlie Brown mystified our reality and the reasons for his queasiness on the baseball field, seeing it as a mirror of truth.

The others in the group would remain sturdy and anchored. They're the ones who somehow understood Lucy's five-cent psychotherapy booth as a practical and reasonable response to the childhood angst that accompanies a kid on the 10th day of forgetting to take their eggshells to art class. Proofs of God mean little to them, because God is the proof.

Urban Writer

Avrum Rosensweig

APPLE DUMP CAKE

Looks like a cake, but tastes like an apple pie

- 5 medium apples, peeled, cored, sliced
- 4 tsp cinnamon, divided
- 1 tsp ground nutmeg
- 1/2 c sugar
- 1-1/4 c apple cider or juice
- 18 oz. box yellow cake mix
- 3/4 c butter, melted
- 1 c chopped nuts (pecans or walnuts)

Preheat oven to 375° F. Lightly grease 9"x13" pan. In pan, mix apples with 2 tsp. cinnamon, nutmeg and sugar. Spread evenly in pan. Pour apple cider over apples. Sprinkle dry cake mix over apple mixture. Sprinkle with remaining cinnamon. Pour melted butter over top. Bake 45 min. or until golden brown and bubbly.

A memorandum of agreement for future exchange was signed between the Board of Trade of Metropolitan Montreal and the Federation of Israeli Chambers of Commerce (FICC) during the weeklong economic mission to Israel and the West Bank led by Montreal Mayor Gérald Tremblay.

After a day of fasting, light appetizers are often easier to digest, says food writer, Beverly Levitt.

Rabbi Lawrence A. Hoffman, talks about the importance of confessing our sins on Yom Kippur – and remembering to act nobly.

And so is Yom Kippur.

There are those of us who sing the words to Unitaneh Tokef, "who shall be at peace and who shall be pursued... who shall live and who shall perish" and entertain it as a metrical composition and fine piece of balladry.

And then there are those among us who believe in infinite possibility and that we should live each day as though it might end without us.

And so is Yom Kippur.

It's 25 hours of holy devotion. It's a day of great protest, when we put on our fancy dress and rail against God for Her reminder that we are created in Her image. It's the time when we imagine what really is behind the curtain and in our minds pull it back to reveal something outside of us, much bigger than us. Yom Kippur is that moment when we are crystal clear about how a Jewish woman in Auschwitz could fast on the Day of Atonement, and equally understanding of the other person in the Holocaust who spat at her memories: the image of the rabbi standing confidently holy in his kittel, his white robe.

And so is Yom Kippur.

We don't eat. We don't drink. We don't anoint ourselves or have intimate relations or wear leather shoes. We abstain from all of these things because on this day we suspend the things that paste our muscles and sinews to our spirit, our soul. And with that, some of us will nearly fall over from the weight of the Book of Life on our shoulders, and some of us will assertively strut forward as if no heavenly judgment was passed at all.

Most of us on Yom Kippur, however, will do both. We will, because at the core of our humanness we are the long, final haunting blow of the shofar – the tekiah gedolah, the one that goes on forever, and the one that we know will eventually stop.

Tension rises on Sinai border

Terrorists kill IDF soldier

Ilan Ben Zion and Gabe Fisher
The Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — A senior member of Egypt's Supreme Council of Armed Forces warned Israel against considering an incursion into the Sinai Peninsula to contain terrorist activity.

Speaking anonymously to the Egyptian daily Al-Masry Al-Yom on Monday, the official said that the Egyptian leadership was closely following developments in Sinai and threatened to "cut off the hand" of any foreign or domestic aggressor. He also praised the ongoing anti-terrorism Egyptian operations in Sinai.

The council member said that Egypt takes seriously Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's reported desire to "purge" the Sinai of terrorists, and he warned against Israeli attempts to "provoke Egypt."

Egypt has mobilized large military forces to the Sinai in light of the rapidly deteriorating security situation there. A number of terror attacks have been aimed against Israel, including a shooting on Sept. 21 that left one Israeli soldier dead.

The official's words came shortly after Egyptian MP Mohammed Abd al-Haleem told Al-Arabiya that "it is impossible under any circumstances that Israel would conduct strikes against Egyptians in Sinai."

Regarding the buildup of Egyptian troops in the peninsula, Haleem said, "We have updated Israel regarding the sending of more troops than allowed under the Camp David accords in order to finish the military missions in Sinai."

"We are updating the Israelis so that they remain calm," he added. "We will not act against them."

He explained that Cairo could not wait until the necessary amendments were made to the Egypt-Israel Peace Treaty, which greatly limits the presence of Egyptian forces in the peninsula.

Haleem added that the military operation against Islamist terrorists in the area would continue for an unspecified amount of time.

Terrorists launched a cross-border attack from Sinai Sept. 21 against Israeli Defence Forces soldiers who working on the border fence.

Italy Stands In

OTTAWA — Foreign Minister John Baird confirmed in Parliament last week that Italy has agreed to Canada's request to represent its interests in Iran after Canada shut its embassy in Tehran earlier this month. In addition to fearing for the safety of Canadian diplomats, among the reasons cited for the sudden move were repeated threats by Iranian officials to destroy Israel and Iran's drive to develop nuclear weapons.

Elmo Arrested Again

NEW YORK — A New York man who was arrested in June for dressing in an Elmo costume and shouting anti-semitic rants in Central Park returned and again was arrested. Adam Sandler, 48, pleaded guilty on Sept. 19 to disorderly conduct and was sentenced to two days community service. He was arrested a day earlier dressed as the Sesame Street character. Witnesses said he was shouting antisemitic slurs. Sandler, who isn't related to the actor of the same name, underwent psychiatric evaluation in June.

Lewinsky To Tell All

NEW YORK — Monica Lewinsky is reportedly writing a tell-all book about her affair with former U.S. president Bill Clinton. She will get $12 million for the book, the New York Post reported, citing friends of the former White House intern, who said Lewinsky, 39, is out for "revenge." The Post said Lewinsky, who is Jewish, will release love letters she wrote to Clinton and give details about his private life with wife Hillary. The Post reported that despite having a master's degree, Lewinsky hasn't been able to find a job since the affair.

Canadian IDF 'Deserter' Freed For Holiday

TEL AVIV — A woman with Canadian and Israeli citizenship who was jailed in Israel for allegedly avoiding military service was furloughed for Rosh Hashanah.

Yana Gorelik, 30, travelled from London to Israel Sept. 2 for her cousin's wedding. She was arrested and held in an Israeli army prison until Sept. 16 without bail. She was slated to return to prison last week, the Times of Israel reported.

She reportedly spent Rosh Hashanah with an aunt in Bat Yam. Her court hearing, which had been postponed twice, was set for Sept. 20.

Israel accuses Gorelik of deserting the army after moving to Toronto with her family at age 17. Her family said she visited Israel in 2010 and 2011 without incident. But on arriving in Israel with her fiancé, authorities told her to report to an army base the next day to sign papers and settle her affairs with the military. At the base, she was arrested and brought to jail in central Israel, the Toronto Star reported.

After receiving draft orders at 17, she was legally obligated to report for two years of service, but left Israel without trying to get out of it, the IDF told the Star.

Israeli military police began an operation in May to arrest thousands of army deserters and draft dodgers, including several foreigners, the Star reported.

was paid for by the Organization for the Resolution of Agunot, an Orthodox group. Friedman and his ex-wife got a civil divorce in April 2010, but citing a custody dispute over their daughter, he has yet to give her a get, without which she can't remarry Jewishly.

TanenbaumCHAT tackles mental health issues

Symptoms can manifest before a person's 18th birthday

Margaret Klompas

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Veteran educator Margaret Klompas –head of guidance at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's Wilmington Avenue campus – is tackling the issue of mental health with a new program at the school called "Disable the Label."

"We have to talk about the elephant in the room," she told The CJN.

Four months ago, Klompas attended a "Focus on Mental Health" conference that was geared to post-high school institutions, where she was struck by a statistic on a fact sheet: "Seventy per cent of adults living with mental illness say symptoms developed before they were 18 years old. The fear of stigma often delays diagnosis and treatment; therefore, early intervention can make an enormous difference over a lifetime."

Over the 30 or so years that Klompas has been at TanenbaumCHAT, she's dealt with many students.

Although she has seen only "a few" with mental health issues, she said that for every one of them, "I'm pretty sure there are many others who don't [talk to me]."

The Queen's University Alumni Review reported earlier this year that, "according to mental health experts, one in four young people experience some form of mental disorder – from depression and anxiety, to bipolar disorder and schizophrenia – while attending high school, university or college. Roughly one in 10,000 will attempt suicide, which is the leading non-accidental cause of death in the 14-to-24 age group."

Earlier this month, Klompas emailed TanenbaumCHAT alumni to let them know about her initiative. She said she would like to invite four recent alumni to take part in a panel in December, to discuss how their illness affected them in high school and university, and also to offer advice on overcoming challenges.

Less than 24 hours later, she was "swamped" with replies. One former student called in tears.

"Obviously, I've touched a nerve," Klompas said.

She has also enlisted students' help in organizing a student committee, and was gratified by the number of teens who volunteered.

Unless the totally unexpected comes to pass – and stubborn mules turn into sleek, muscular thoroughbreds – the end of December will mark four years without direct, face-to-face peace negotiations between the Palestinian and Israeli leadership.

For the first time since before the signing of the Oslo accords, an entire U.S. presidential term will have elapsed without the two contending sides arguing their respective cases across a table rather than in the media.

Many commentators, among them Israelis too, quickly point an accusing finger at Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu for the bilateral stagnancy. He has been utterly unwilling, they say, to grant the Palestinians the entry they need to sit down with him with honour and respect, to agree to a full stop to the building of homes in Jewish communities in the West Bank. Netanyahu, they say, does not believe in a two-state solution.

But this is grossly unfair.

It is true that a lack of progress in the Palestinian file means that Netanyahu need not worry about bringing "hard" decisions to his right-wing coalition partners and risk the possible rupture of his government. It also means that he can focus more of his energy and attention on the hyper-complicated, white-knuckle Iran file.

But ever since he publicly declared some three years ago at the BESA Centre of Bar Ilan University that he did favour a two-state solution, that the Israeli public must be prepared to give up land in exchange for a true peace with its Palestinian neighbours, Netanyahu cannot be accused of subverting a two-state solution.

Moreover, it should also be recalled that he did agree to a 10-month construction moratorium in the West Bank for the sake of inducing the Palestinians to come to the table. But they still refused.

Thus, the Palestinian leaders have merely stalled their people's dream of independence once again. Instead of forcing the Israeli government's hand with honest, good faith negotiations, they have preferred to constantly and continually point an accusing finger at Israel and bare their victim's breast for the pity of a sympathetic audience. Could it be that the Palestinian leaders actually do not want to negotiate with Israel lest their own hand be forced to accommodate a Jewish state alongside their own?

An additional four years of possibility have now been forfeited because of the patently false pretext that Mahmoud Abbas foisted not only on his Israeli counterpart, but, more painfully, on his own people. Thus, these latest four years of missed moments can be added to the missed moments of 1947, 1949, 1967, 1979, 1993, 2000 and ever since.

But such inept, convoluted, counter-productive and counter-intuitive decision-making is characteristic of the Palestinian leadership.

There are other examples.

Last week, Mideast sources reported that Syrian government forces killed at least 18 Palestinians. Their bodies were gruesomely displayed in Damascus. The PLO secretary general, Yasser Abed Rabbo, condemned the massacre. But these were not the first Palestinians killed by Bashar Assad's regime. They are counted among the 20,000 individuals, mostly civilians, who have died in the Syrian civil war.

Even though the slaughter of the Palestinians can be traced directly to the intervention of Iran – Tehran is Assad's key support, sending funds, military materiel, and even Iranian fighters; planning and leading Syrian strategy and training Syrian soldiers, – this has not stopped the Palestinian leaders from variously seeking their audiences with the Iranian leadership or backing Iran's malevolent schemes for the Jewish state.

Last month, the World Bank reported that the Palestinian economy is in desperate straits and requires an immediate infusion of funds from the cadre of international donors that regularly send funds to the PA. And oh yes, the bank said, Israel was mostly to blame. But as Israeli commentator Evelyn Gordon noted in a recent article in Commentary, the real cause of the PA's financial crisis is its surrealistic relation with its deadly rivals in Gaza.

The PA sends 48 per cent of its expenditures to Gaza, much of it in the form of full salaries to a group of some 60,000 former PA employees "to sit at home and do absolutely nothing, just to keep them from working for the Hamas government instead." Yet, according to Gordon, "ever since Hamas took over the territory in 2007, revenues received from Gaza have plummeted from 28 per cent to a mere four per cent of the PA's budget. In other words, the PA has a hole equal to 44 per cent of its budget due solely to its unbalanced income and outlays on Gaza. Nothing Israel does will be able to compensate for that."

There are other examples too of counter-productive decision-making by Palestinian leaders, such as the PA's impending renewal of its bid for statehood recognition at the United Nations. But the exhausting cumulative effect of such antipathetic thinking toward the Palestinian people by the Palestinian leaders is to push statehood further away than ever.

Palestinian leaders continue to betray their own people. —MBD

Sam the Record Man a Canadian icon

Jeff Rosen
News Editor

Sam "The Record Man" Sniderman oversaw tremendous changes in the music business, including the demise of the 78, the brief appearance of the four-track cartridge that preceded the eight-track, and the eventual appearance of the cassette, which was finally replaced by the CD and Internet downloads. Alas, he will not be around to witness further changes in the music industry. Sniderman died on Sept. 22 at age 92.

Despite being best known for his music emporium, which he helmed from his flagship store on Yonge Street at Dundas Street for four decades, Sniderman's first love was the legal profession. "I would have loved to have been a lawyer," Sniderman told The C/N in 1989. "What a difference that would have made."

A single incident in Sniderman's youth steered him away from seeking to be a valued member of the legal profession and resulted instead in his becoming the father of the Canadian recording industry.

At the time, Sniderman was a bright 16-year-old in his fifth year at Harbord Collegiate, and he had the opportunity to receive a scholarship in ancient languages and modern history. However, while helping out at his brother Syd's radio store on College Street one day, Sniderman said, a judge came in, and in their conversation, the judge said there would be no future for lawyers and there was no sense in Sniderman's going to university.

"I just pitched it all in and went to work in the radio business with my brother," Sniderman said.

From this small radio business in Toronto's old "Jewish district," the national record chain gradually grew – and kept on growing.

Reflecting on his contribution to the music industry back in 1989, Sniderman lauded his own role. "I think I've done an awful lot of good for Canadian talent. I've been a major part of helping strengthen the Canadian recording industry."

Sniderman's funeral was held on Sept. 25. A public memorial is planned for October.

War Child Canada founder speaks at Freedom Day

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

About 3,000 Ontario middle and high school students gathered last week at Yonge-Dundas Square in Toronto to celebrate Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies' (FSWC) third annual Freedom Day.

Freedom Day, held each year on Sept. 20, the anniversary of Holocaust survivor Simon Wiesenthal's death, aims to promote the need to share Canadian values of democracy, human rights and freedom with others around the world.

FSWC president and CEO Avi Benlolo took to the stage to welcome the students, saying he was thrilled to see so many people gathered "in the name of freedom and in the name of democracy and in the name of improving the world one step at a time."

"We must all work hard to try to spread freedom and spread knowledge and understanding, fight oppression, fight hate and fight intolerance wherever it persists," Benlolo added.

Throughout the event, students were entertained by Entertainment Tonight Canada co-host Rick Campanelli, who hosted the event, singer Marlowe Stone, and the Sole Power dancers.

Award-winning composer Zane Zalis was joined on stage by two soloists who performed his Holocaust-themed oratorios I Believe and I Have a Name.

But the entertainment was broken up by speakers who aimed to galvanize the students to help those who are victimized by violent war and oppression.

Keynote speaker Samantha Nutt — founder of War Child Canada, a medical doctor, an award-winning humanitarian, author, speaker and a leading authority on the impact of war — told the students that each of them is capable of making an extraordinary contribution to humanitarian issues if they choose to.

"I understand how easy it is for all of us living here to think about what's happening in other parts of the world and feel as if we are powerless to do anything about it," Nutt said, adding that there are currently 28 ongoing conflicts.

"Five million people have died in the war in the Congo over the past 13 years, 300,000 have died in Darfur, thousands have died in the recent conflict in Syria, hundreds of thousands have died in the conflict in Iraq — the numbers are overwhelming," she said.

During one of her visits to Darfur with her organization, War Child Canada, Nutt said that she, too, wrestled with thoughts of helplessness and powerlessness.

She spoke about the current situation in Darfur, where over the past eight years, 300,000 people have been murdered and two million more have been forced from their homes to live in overcrowded, disease-ridden refugee camps.

FSWC president Avi Benlolo

"When you're meeting people who live in Darfur... it is easy for anyone to feel overwhelmed and feel like anything you will ever do will never make that much of a difference... I think we are too often paralyzed by our unwillingness to even try," Nutt said.

"But it is possible, by questioning our assumptions and challenging the status quo and steadfastly refusing to be silent in the face of injustice, to speak up, speak out and to defy those who seek to perpetuate hate and resentment and animosity and crimes against humanity."

Franco Ntazinda, a Rwandan-born refugee who immigrated to Canada in 1986, spoke about the Rwandan genocide in 1994 that killed most of his extended family that chose to stay behind in Rwanda.

As someone who experienced life in an oppressive country, and now thrives in a free country, Ntazinda expressed how much he cherishes the freedoms most Canadians take for granted.

He recalled the first time he voted in a Canadian election.

"It was like yesterday... I was the first in line to vote. To know that my vote would count made me feel like I was somebody. Ever since, I have never missed a chance to cast my ballot," he said.

Mario Silva, chair of the 2012 Task Force for International Co-operation on Holocaust Education, Remembrance and Research, also addressed the gathering, focusing his speech on the legacy of Simon Wiesenthal and the importance of carrying on his mission to keep the memory of the Holocaust and all other genocides alive.

Frank Chalk, founding co-director of the Montreal Institute for Genocide and Human Rights Studies, and a history professor at Concordia University, used poetry to emphasize the importance of promoting human rights.

Hear our prayer

We hope that it did not pass unnoticed by the Heavenly Court that the world's pre-eminent planner of harm to Jews was scheduled to speak from the rostrum of the most august international forum on Yom Kippur. Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad was scheduled to address the United Nations General Assembly on Wednesday this week. He was also scheduled to enjoy a full media tour during his stay in New York. At each stop, but especially from the marble dais of the General Assembly, he will have repeated his various ignorant and malicious attacks against Jews, Jewish history and the Jewish state.

The United States denied visas to 20 Iranian officials who requested accreditation, including two of Ahmadinejad's cabinet ministers, of the 160-member Iranian delegation that accompanied the Iranian president. Alas, it did not cancel Ahmadinejad's visa.

Nor did UN Secretary General Ban Ki-Moon cancel the invitation to the Iranian leader, despite the efforts of Jewish community leaders in the United States and Canada.

Liberal MP Irvin Cotler sent a letter last week to Ban pleading with him to cancel Ahmadinejad's appearance. "Given President Ahmadinejad's hateful and incendiary incitement, flagrant disregard for principles of international law, massive repression of domestic human rights and complicity with international terrorism, providing him with an opportunity – indeed privilege – to speak to the community of nations is simply as unacceptable as it is unworthy of the United Nations. My fellow parliamentarians and myself would implore you to exercise your authority under Article 99 [of the UN charter] to prevent this affront to the United Nations, its charter and human decency," Cotler wrote.

The Orthodox Union and the Rabbinical Council of America took the admittedly unusual step of calling upon all congregations to dedicate a specific moment during their services on Yom Kippur to pray for an end to the threat of a nuclear-armed Iran.

"Yom Kippur is not a day for politics," the OU read, "But Yom Kippur 5773 is different."

"On this Yom Kippur the world faces an evil regime whose leaders have publicly committed themselves to destroying the State of Israel and to harming Jews worldwide."

The earthly court of diplomats, heads of governments, media celebrities and magazine pundits may indeed have found it appropriate to give a place and a forum to Ahmadinejad for the continued public pronouncement of his hatred and his incitement to genocide. But we, the "jurors," the people of his intended victims, denounce, condemn and "convict" him and pray for the confounding of his genocidal plans.

And we hope the Heavenly Court hears our prayers.

The American Jewish Congress released a policy statement endorsing an international conference for Middle East peace to serve as the framework for direct Arab-Israeli talks. The matter had split Israel's governing unity coalition, with Labour in favour and Likud opposed.

The world looks on

For the first time in more than 60 years, the world is on the brink of being relieved of the Israel problem, without having to do anything. By letting Iran manufacture an atomic bomb and attack Israel, the Jewish state will cease to exist. All they will have to contend with are a relative handful of Jewish malcontents – a bunch of accountants, doctors and lawyers – and the problem goes away. Granted, Gaza and the West Bank will also evaporate, but who cares about their inhabitants anyway? Part of Lebanon and Syria may be affected, too, but it's a small price to pay.

We will be left with a smaller world Jewish population than existed after World War II, without the prospect of a country to call our own. I appreciate that many assimilated Jews will cleave to their current adopted homeland, and the self-hating Jews will revel in the outcome but, for the rest, there will remain an emptiness that existed for millennia. The phrase with which the Pesach seder and the Neilah service conclude will revert to the pre-20th-century dream: "Next year in Jerusalem."

Israel alone cannot possibly eradicate the threat completely. Without help from countries who possess the weaponry to assist in the prevention of Israel's demise, it will be extremely difficult for it to survive. Canada, a lone voice of reason in the wilderness, does not project the might that would tempt other countries to follow its lead. Sanctions have proved to be a mere irritation to the Iranian government, and any opposition from within is severely punished. While the world, with bated breath, looks on.

Iran: should Israel act?

Sheldon Kirshner writes on the pros and cons of an Israeli unilateral bombing of Iran's nuclear facilities in "Civilians will bear brunt of a war with Iran" (Sept. 13). In sum, we are told what we already know: war is horrible, costly and lives will be lost. What the article lacks is a postscript, that being the precious luxury of a choice.

LET THEM GO...

Zvi Feldman, Majdi Halabi,
Guy Hever, Yehuda Katz

In the late 1930s and early '40s, another tyrant threatened the existence of Jews and spewed his antisemitic venom, all while the world remained or nodded in silent approval. Jewish leaders pleaded with then-U.S. president Franklin D. Roosevelt to at least bomb the railway lines leading to the gas chambers to slow down Hitler's march to the destruction of the Jews. Roosevelt chose not to do so.

And so, we come to the present when another vicious madman, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, is fanning the flames of antisemitism and threatening Israel's existence while the world stands by. And again, Jewish leaders are pleading with an American president, this time to bomb Iran's nuclear facilities and stop Ahmadinejad's march to the destruction of Israel. Now, however, there is one precious difference: an option.

Nothing was done in the 1930s and '40s because there was no option. So should nothing be done in the hope that U.S. President Barack Obama will come to the rescue of Israel, or should Israel act like the mighty, moral nation that it is, secure in the knowledge of the justice of its cause and its might?

Western governments and Iran

It is not with any intention to be light-hearted that I refer to the 1980s satirical BBC television series Yes, Prime Minister in relation to Iran. However, in my opinion, there is something in the episode A Victory for Democracy, inspired by the 1983 U.S. invasion of Grenada, a Commonwealth realm, that parallels western governments' actions, or lack thereof, regarding Iran's clear intention to develop nuclear bombs.

The episode talks about four stages. In stage 1, we say nothing is going to happen. In stage 2, we say something may be about to happen, but we should do nothing about it. In stage 3, we say that maybe something should be done about it, but there's nothing we can do. In stage 4, we say maybe there was something we could have done, but it's too late now.

I very much fear that stage 4 may come about.

Peace deal must compensate Jewish refugees

Aharon Mor and Orly R. Rahimiyan

Second of two parts

Jewish and Arab Refugees in the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict

The issue of Jewish refugees from Arab countries in the Middle East, North Africa, and Iran is salient when evaluating the general topic of refugees in the greater Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

At the start of the 20th century there were around one million Jews living in Iran, North Africa, and the Middle East, not including those living in the Land of Israel. That number fell to 500,000 after the 1948 war and to 100,000 after the 1967 war. Today, that number is somewhere between 15,000 and 35,000, with the majority living in Iran. Thus, close to one million Jews became refugees as a result of the policy changes of countries in the Middle East and North Africa.

Today there are two categories of Palestinian refugees: those from the wars in 1948 and 1967, and internally displaced persons (IDPs) who were forced to flee their homes but were unable to regain them upon returning. The exact numbers for both are unclear and are derived from rough approximations, population trends and censuses.

Studies suggest that the most plausible number of refugees from the War of Independence is 550,000, although estimates range from 400,000 to 1,000,000. Studies also suggest that the Six Day War created 300,000 refugees, although 100,000 returned after the war and another 100,000 were already counted as refugees from the 1948 war. These yield a sum of 100,000 refugees from the 1967 war and a total of 650,000 refugees from the two wars.

Although estimates vary, when the two refugee exoduses are compared, it can be concluded with a high degree of likelihood that the number of Jewish refugees was some 50 per cent greater than that of Palestinian refugees.

Value of Assets Lost by Jewish and Palestinian Refugees

There are many estimates for the value of the assets lost by Jewish and Palestinian refugees spanning a wide range of values, with some grossly exaggerated or skewed by political considerations.

The best estimate for assets lost by Palestinian refugees of the 1948 war was compiled by John Measham Berncastle, who undertook the task in the early 1950s under the aegis of the newly formed United Nations Conciliation Commission for Palestine. Berncastle's estimate was 100 million Palestinian pounds for land and buildings and 20 million for movable property. Other estimates add four to five million Palestinian pounds for Arab bank accounts blocked by the Israeli government. The total of 125 million Palestinian pounds amounts to $350 million in 1948, or $650 per refugee, a number consistent with per-capita value lost for similar situations, such as Poland in the 1930s.

Additional consideration should be accorded to the asset losses of the 100,000 Palestinian refugees from the 1967 war and the 40,000 IDPs (included even though they usually received new property and/or compensation). At a similarly realistic $700 per capita, that would amount to another $100 million. Thus, the total of assets lost by Palestinians is some $450 million, which in 2012 values amounts to $4.4 billion.

Although it is also difficult to estimate the value of assets lost by Jewish refugees, a similar methodology has yielded an approximation of $700 million in 1948 prices or $6.7 billion in 2012 prices. This number is higher than the estimate for Palestinian refugees for a number of reasons. A significant difference in lifestyles could account for a difference in the amount of assets accumulated, as well as the fact that there were more Jewish refugees than Palestinian refugees. Arab governments also limited the value of movable property that Jew-least 50 per cent higher than those of Palestinian refugees.

The Legal Case for Rights and Redress

The international definition of a refugee clearly applies to Jews displaced from Arab countries. A refugee is a person who "owing to a well-founded fear of being persecuted for reasons of race, religion, nationality, membership of a particular social group, or political opinion, is outside the country of his nationality and is unable to, or owing to such fear, is unwilling to avail himself of the protection of that country," according to the 1951 UN Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees.

The issue of refugees, both Jewish and Palestinian, has been raised in UN discussions and resolutions. In 1948, the General Assembly adopted Resolution 194 (III), which called for the resolution of refugee issues, both Jewish and Palestinian, in its 11th paragraph. General Assembly human problems that occurred on both sides. According to international law, any human rights violation gives rise to a right to redress for victims and their beneficiaries. The duty to redress falls upon the state responsible for the human rights violations.

The Solution: An International Middle East Peace Fund

During two recent, seminal Palestinian-Israeli negotiations, the issue of an "international fund" was raised as an essential part of any comprehensive Middle East peace plan. The purposes of such an international peace fund would be fourfold. First, it would provide adequate funding for the development of the infrastructure for a new Palestinian state, including hospitals, schools and roads. Second, it would provide funding for Israel to establish secure defence perimeters along the new borders, as agreed upon by both states. Third, it would provide compensation for all refugees, both Jewish and Arab, who were victims of the Arab-Israeli conflict. Fourth, it would retroactively compensate countries – such as Israel (for Jewish refugees) and Jordan (for Palestinians) who invested efforts and resources to the absorption of refugees.

The UN Compensation Commission and Fund20 provide a useful model that could be negotiated as part of a comprehensive Arab-Israeli settlement. The procedures and categories adopted by the fund after Iraq's invasion of Kuwait could be adapted to fit the needs of an international peace fund for the Middle East.

The establishment of such a multilateral fund, to be endowed by the G8 countries and others, would ensure international involvement and legitimacy for any comprehensive Middle East peace plan. This plan would involve contributions from Israel and Arab countries, as well as from international donors such as the United States. Such a fund would create "a huge pool of stakeholders in the peace process," said Isaac Devash, a volunteer with the group Justice for Jews from Arab Countries.

Conclusions

Today, a large number of Israeli citizens are descendants of Jews displaced from Arab countries. The rights of these Jewish refugees (and their descendants) should be recognized and addressed by appropriate measures such as an international fund, as part of any comprehensive negotiations to resolve the overall issue of refugees.

Such a solution would create a connection between the Jewish and Palestinian refugee problems and would offer a holistic, comprehensive, and just solution to the refugee issue for both sides. As part of a final Middle East peace plan, such a fund would redress historical injustices and ensure adequate compensation for all victims of the Arab-Israeli conflict.

ish emigrants could take with them, while Palestinian emigrants had no such limitations. Additionally, Palestinian refugees have received more than 90 per cent of the blocked bank accounts from the Israeli government, totalling some $86 million in 2007 prices, while there have only been a few instances of Jewish refugees receiving property back.

Some obstacles still remain. There have been financial demands from both the Israeli and Palestinian sides that have not been seriously considered, in part because both sides have requested astronomical dollar amounts ranging in the hundreds of billions of dollars, and in part due to reasons connected to whether the refugee issue will be negotiated in the peace process and whether such negotiations will include both Jewish and Palestinian refugees. It is also difficult to determine the value of some assets, and how to calculate the current value. The bottom line, however, is that no matter what methodology is used, the losses of Jewish refugees from Middle Eastern and North African countries are almost certainly at resolutions are not binding, but the Arab government representatives still voted against it.

On two later occasions, in 1957 and 1967, the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) determined that Jews fleeing from Arab countries were refugees who fell within the mandate of the UNHCR. In 1967, the UN Security Council unanimously adopted Resolution 242, which stipulates that a comprehensive peace settlement must include "a just settlement of the refugee problem." No distinction is made between Arab refugees and Jewish refugees. Indeed, the intent to include both Jewish and Arab refugees in Resolution 242 is evidenced by the fact that during the UN debate, the Soviet Union's delegation attempted to restrict the "just settlement" solely to Palestinian refugees.

Israel has also included the topic of refugees in its bi-national agreements with Egypt and Jordan, as well as in the Oslo process. Some agreements do not distinguish between Israeli and Palestinian refugees, while others discuss the

Let's use Sukkot to reconsecrate links to Israel

The holiday of Sukkot needs a makeover, at least in the Diaspora. Known traditionally as Hechag, The Holiday, for its primacy and passion, Sukkot is neglected in North America. Partially this is due to holiday burnout – Jews are exhausted after feasting on Rosh Hashanah and fasting on Yom Kippur. But partially this is due to no longer appreciating this holiday's delightful and meaningful messages.

Sukkot is one of the Shalosh Regalim, the three walking or pilgrimage festivals, delineated in the Torah. These three important holidays brought Jews from all over the country to Jerusalem, bearing their first fruits and sacrifices. All three holidays emphasized the centrality of Zion in Jewish life. They linked Jewish religious obligations with a sense of Jewish national belonging. And they taught us to be humble before the Lord while delighting in earth's bounty.

Sukkot, with its temporary booths, was about the Jewish people's journey from Egypt to the Promised Land. It emphasized the transience of material attachments amid the permanence of lasting anchors. It emphasized the perpetual search for home, for rootedness, for anchors, learning how to grow and stretch by feeling rooted yet searching for more.

All these are important themes for us today. We should renew Sukkot by using it as a holiday to showcase the importance of Israel in our lives and to rethink what it means to live in a world with a Jewish state.

We can start by learning from Israel on this one. In Israel, Sukkot is widely observed and universally beloved. It's the magical culmination of the holiday season. School vacation injects a festive air and guarantees festivals galore – even though some harried parents are stuck managing the kids while having to work. The weather is often glorious, with the heat of summer lifting, just as in Canada signs of winter begin accumulating. And sukkt – temporary huts – sprout out of Israeli buildings and sidewalks, appearing as quickly and dramatically as shovels after the first Canadian snowstorm of the season.

Gil Troy
in Montreal

Many non-religious Israelis enjoy building sukkt because of the agricultural associations – it's a harvest holiday. Others enjoy the Zionist associations, with its hands-on expression of homecoming. And others simply enjoy the sheer fun of it, the creativity in the building and decorating. I've seen extraordinary sukkt on many kibbutzim made of palm fronds suspended by string. While they need 2-1/2 more solid walls to adhere to Jewish law – some have them – they capture the richness, the greenness and the dance between transience and permanence that are so central to the holiday.

In making Sukkot a forum for celebrating and reconsecrating our relationship with Israel, we should start with the sukkt, the huts, themselves. By decorating them with Israeli posters, Israeli pictures, representations of the seven Israeli agricultural spices, and the lulav and etrog – as so many do – we bring the relationship to Israel alive, sensually, artistically and graphically. In our synagogues, our rabbis should deliver sermons about Israel, focusing on identity Zionism, meaning how we use Israel, the idea of Jewish nationhood, the reality of the Jewish state to revitalize our own Jewish identities. And in our beautifully decorated Sukkot – or in warm houses nearby – we should study texts about Israel. Wouldn't it be great if every year we had community-wide, or worldwide, text-study sessions, knowing that simultaneously dozens, hundreds, thousands, were studying the same texts – say one traditional text and one modern teaching.

Sukkot is about a journey, from slavery to freedom, from homelessness to home, from being passive victims to active shapers of history, from wanderers to builders. Sukkot should invite us to contemplate our own journeys as Jews, as human beings. Where are we going? Are we Jewishly ambitious? In thinking about these issues, in viewing our Jewish identities through the prism of Israel, we can get more clarity about who we are and where we are heading.

Holidays are symbolic moments that evoke our pasts. They are often suffused with childhood memories and nostalgia. Many have strong feelings about what to do and what not to do in trying to recreate the past. But we can't have a Judaism that's only about yesterday. We also need holidays that celebrate today – and inspire us to build, journey, and decorate, the key Sukkot verbs – a more meaningful tomorrow.

A change would do you good

Q: How many Jews does it take to change a light bulb?

A: 30. One to change the bulb and 29 to give contradictory advice to the person changing it.

Q: How many Orthodox Jews?

A: This light bulb has never been changed and never should be!

Q: How many Conservative Jews?

A: Call a committee meeting to decide if men and women can change it together, or if openly gay people can change it at all.

Q: How many Reform rabbis?

A: Don't worry – anyone can change it whenever and however they want to.

Q: How many Reconstructionists?

A: One to wish they were doing what the Orthodox Jew does, one to wish they were doing what the Reform Jew does, one to wish they were doing what the Renewal Jew does, and one to discuss intellectually what Rabbi Mordecai Kaplan would have done.

Q: And how many congregants does it take to change a light bulb in the synagogue?

A: Don't you dare touch it! My family donated that bulb!

People are stubborn about change.

Change is really hard. We deny we need the change, procrastinate about making the change, or tell others why they need to change and we don't.

Woody Guthrie wrote, "If a day goes by that don't change some of your old notions for new ones, that is just about like trying to milk a dead cow."

I'll admit I've milked my share of dead cows, and I bet many of you have, too. But I've been forced many times in my life to rethink something I was sure of. I'm always so impressed by people who are able to do a 180-degree turn on convictions they once had. People who convert to Judaism, for example, change whole belief systems. People who once couldn't, under any circumstances, accept gay relationships turn and rejoice at a sibling or friend's gay wedding. People who, years ago, could look me straight in the eye and say "I could never accept a woman rabbi" may be reading this right now and saying, "What was I thinking?"

There's tremendous discomfort that comes with outgrowing an opinion. Change brings with it an inherent sense of threat, even if it's change for the better. Change forces us to ask: "What does this mean about who I really am? If I sincerely believed or behaved X way before, and now I'm willing to believe or behave Y, am I the same person? Was I wrong all along?" Change brings with it a kind of disappointment, a kind of loss of the old self who was so sure about things. A kind of grief that what we once believed is now wrong, or obsolete, not useful or even harmful. "I changed my mind" is so much deeper than just changing your clothes. It's about a shift in core values.

Change is hard, because it's at once both terrifying and stimulating. It unnerves us at

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein
in Toronto

the same time as it excites us. We crave it, and we fear it. Rightfully so. Things were always better back then, when we felt secure in the knowledge that we were right.

We weren't right about so many things, though. I think the High Holidays are meant to be a kind of kick in the head, the time we ask ourselves not if we can change, but if we will change. It's a paradox that Judaism can inspire us to change. After all, religion is supposed to be a stabilizing force in the world, the one unchanging value that doesn't bend with the wind. Judaism is about, in many ways, resistance to change. And yet none of us still sacrifices animals. None of us go to blood-letters instead of doctors. Even haredi Jews use cellphones. Judaism's own skills of change can be instructive to us: change without loss of self-identity, change without disappearance.

Charles Darwin wrote, "It is not the strongest of the species that survive, nor the most intelligent, but the one most responsive to change." Organizations, movement and even synagogues that adapt and grow are those that prosper and survive. The ones left behind stagnate. Their offerings, services and programs are redundant and predictable. So, too, with people.

The High Holidays challenge us not to become redundant and predictable in our own lives. They challenge us to change ourselves so we can change the world.

A bonanza of films from TIFF

This year's edition of the Toronto International Film Festival was unusually rich, interesting and stimulating, a veritable bonanza for cineastes. The films reviewed here are expected to open in theatres in 2013.

A sampler:

Ziad Doueiri's The Attack, a thriller set in Israel and the West Bank and based on a novel by Yasmina Khadra, is topical, visceral, gripping and thought-provoking, cutting to the core of the dual identity of Israel's large Arab minority.

Amin Jaafari (Ali Suliman) is a renowned and respected surgeon working in Tel Aviv. As the film opens, he accepts a prestigious medical award from his Jewish peers. As he tartly observes, he is the first Muslim Arab in Israel to receive such a prize. He admits that he has felt anger and hostility from Jews, but strikes an optimistic note by saying that he looks forward to the future.

Jaafari's life goes into a tailspin when he learns that his beloved wife, Siham (Reymond Amsalem), a Christian from Nazareth, was the suicide bomber who walked into a crowded restaurant in Tel Aviv and killed 17 Israelis. "Tell me I'm dreaming," cries out Jaafari, a fervent believer in Arab-Jewish coexistence.

Thrown into prison on suspicion of being an accomplice, he is grilled by an Israeli security official. As his Jewish friends rally around him in a gesture of support, he insists it is all a mistake. But he is soon disabused of his conviction. Tormented by guilt, he retraces his wife's recent trip to the West Bank to visit relatives. It is a bruising journey of self-discovery as he grapples with his conflicting identities, as well as a voyage into the beating heart of Palestinian nationalism. Doueiri directs with a firm, intelligent hand, coaxing superb performances from his cast. Not to be missed.

Michael Mayer's powerful Out in the Dark also examines issues pertaining to identity, but in this case, the topic is an unusual gay relationship crossing religious and national lines.

Nimer (Nicholas Jacob), a Palestinian student from the West Bank, meets Roy (Michael Aloni), an Israeli Jewish lawyer, in a Tel Aviv bar. Their mutual attraction is instantaneous and romantic sparks fly. But, given the tensions of the Arab-Israeli dispute, they both wonder whether they should be seeing each other.

In the meantime, Nimer comes under pressure from the Shin Bet to be an informer at a Palestinian university, while Nimer's sister implores him not to continue his studies in Israel, which she archly and arrogantly dismisses as a "godless country." Nimer's brother – a militant Palestinian – and his conservative mother go ballistic when they learn that he is gay and that his partner is a Jew. Roy's father, a liberal, has already urged him to end their friendship for the sake of his career.

The film explores harsh realities that cannot be wished away. Nimer faces a Palestinian society that utterly rejects his sexual orientation. Roy realizes that Nimer will be ostracized by many Israelis simply because of his nationality.

Mayer juggles these incendiary elements with poise and panache, producing high production values. The lead actors deliver blistering performances.

The Palestinian quest for statehood is the subject of Dan Setton's State 194, which revolves around two interlocking themes: the Palestinian Authority's 2011 diplomatic drive to win membership in the United Nations and thus become its 194th member and the PA's campaign to combat Israel's occupation of the West Bank through non-violent means.

This brisk documentary focuses on the PA's top two officials, President Mahmoud Abbas and Prime Minister Salam Fayyad, and on George Mitchell, the former U.S. special representative to the Middle East. Secondary players include Tzipi Livni, Israel's former foreign minister; Benjamin Netanyahu, Israel's current prime minister;

Robert Serry, the UN's envoy to the Middle East; Palestinians and Israelis who seek co-existence, and Jeremy Ben-Ami, the head of J Street, an American organization that favours a two-state solution so that Israel can remain a Jewish and a democratic nation.

Through the lens of Fayyad's trips around the West Bank, Setton shows how the PA, like the Yishuv in Palestine, is preparing for statehood by building institutions and strengthening the economy. A viewer is left with the impression that the Palestinian case for statehood is compelling and cannot be dismissed.

Inch'Allah, a Canadian feature film directed by Anais Barbeau-Lavalette, is clearly and unashamedly pro-Palestinian. A suicide bombing in Israel frames the movie, but Inch'Allah is really about a young Canadian doctor who's inexorably drawn into the blood and guts of the Arab-Israeli conflict.

Chloe (Evelyn Brochu), the physician in question, lives in Israel and works in a West Bank health clinic. Her Israeli neighbour, Ada (Sivan Levy), is doing her military service as a checkpoint guard. Chloe starts off as a neutral observer, but embraces the Palestinian cause after an Arab boy is run over by an Israeli army jeep, after she visits a ruined Palestinian village and after she witnesses a pregnant Palestinian woman losing her baby at an Israeli checkpoint.

The film is active rather than passive in its political orientation. There is an unmistakable reference to stolen Palestinian land. Palestinians are portrayed as underdogs. Israelis are perceived as omnipotent. The camera pans on two inscriptions scrawled on the concrete separation barrier in Jerusalem. The first one equates the Magen David with the swastika. The second shouts out, "Fuck Israel."

Inch'Allah, however, is not a crude propaganda piece. There is evidence of character development, the acting is credible, and the emotions are real.

Eagles, by Dror Sabo and based on a novel by Yoram Kaniuk, unfolds in present-day Tel Aviv as two grumpy old men, Efraim (Yossi Polak) and Moshka (Yehoram Gaon), embark on a surrealistic killing spree after an old flame is killed in a traffic accident.

Proud veterans of the 1948 War of Independence, the pair are alienated from the violent, hedonistic and decadent undercurrents of Israeli society and feel that their precious and hard-fought ideals and values are slipping away.

To Efraim and Moshka, might is right. Their prescription for "cleaning up the garbage" and making things right is way over the top and morally indefensible. But in Sabo's gritty film, the subtext is clear: the elderly still have a contribution to make and should not be ignored and marginalized.

Mira Nair's The Reluctant Fundamentalist, starring Riz Ahmed and Kiefer Sutherland, takes place in Pakistan and the United States before and after the events of 9/11. Changez Khan (Ahmed), a smart and ambitious Pakistani Muslim, buys into the American dream, only to reject it as he confronts xenophobia. In response, he turns toward violence to achieve change. Atmospheric, and with sizzling performances from the leads, the film unfolds to a haunting Urdu soundtrack.

Tony Krawitz's Dead Europe is something of an allegory about the sins and dark underbelly of Europe, past and present. Flouting his mother's wishes, an Australian photographer of Greek ancestry goes to Greece to deposit his late father's ashes. The trip, replete with kinky sex and drugs, summons up the Holocaust, family secrets, Islamophobia and antisemitism. Quite a toxic and bizarre brew.

Israelis, Palestinians said key to wider peace

Turkey favours two-state solution based on pre-'67 lines

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Israel's conflict with the Palestinians is the most important regional issue in the Middle East, and all efforts should be made to resolve it, Turkey's foreign minister declared last week.

Calling for a two-state solution on the basis of the pre-1967 lines, with eastern Jerusalem as the capital of a Palestinian state, Ahmet Davutoglu warned there will be no peace in the Mideast unless the Palestinian conflict is settled.

"If there is no peace in Jerusalem, there is no peace in the Middle East, and if there is no peace in the Middle East, there is no peace in the world," he said in a speech sponsored by the Atlantic Council of Canada, the Atlantic Treaty Association and the consulate general of Turkey in Toronto.

Lamenting that the promises of the 1993 Oslo accords have been dashed, Davutoglu noted that a Palestinian state has yet to be established. "Arabs and Muslims are asking, 'Where is the Palestinian state?'"

Instead, he claimed without elaborating, Palestinians have received "bombs and insults."

"It's time to solve the issue," he added, saying that all Turks agree on the necessity of a Palestinian state.

Davutoglu, who has held his post since 2009, said no Arab state will ever consider making peace with Israel unless a viable Palestinian state is created in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. "Israel should come to the negotiating table without preconditions," he said.

Turkey understands Israel's "security needs," he noted, but the "dignity" of the Palestinians should be addressed through statehood.

In other comments, Davutoglu urged Israel to "integrate itself into the region," scolded Israel for its settlement policy in the territories and stated that Jerusalem should be an "open city for all religions."

Turning to Turkey's strained bilateral relations with Israel, he acknowledged that a good Turkish-Israeli relationship would be an "asset" for the Mideast.

But it is incumbent on Israel to repair the damage caused by the 2010 Mavi Marmara incident, during which Israeli commandos stormed a Turkish vessel trying to break Israel's siege of the Gaza Strip and killed eight Turks and one Turkish American citizen in the process.

Describing Israel's raid on the Turkish ship Mavi Marmara as "an attack on the Turkish nation," he asserted.

Ahmet Davutoglu

"No army can touch Turkish civilians."

Claiming that the current rift between Turkey and Israel can be mended, Davutoglu said, "They (Israel) know what they're supposed to do."

Israel should issue a formal apology to Turkey, pay compensation to the victims and end its naval blockade of Gaza. Turkey is ready to restore normal relations with Israel if it takes these steps, he said.

Davutoglu recalled that Turkey served as a mediator several years ago in an attempt to forge peace between Israel and Syria. If the 2008-09 war in Gaza had not broken out, he said, Israel and Syria could have moved from indirect to direct talks to iron out their problems, he said.

Criticizing Israel for not having informed Turkey of its intention to invade Gaza, he said, "Israel thought it could do what it wanted."

Davutoglu claimed that "a culture of antisemitism" has never existed in Turkey, the successor state of the Ottoman Empire. Nor were Jews in Turkey ever herded into ghettos or subjected to discrimination, he said.

And during the Holocaust, he observed, Turkish diplomats in Europe helped Jews. "For us, it was a human responsibility."

Reviewing the broad principles of Turkey's more assertive and activist foreign policy, Davutoglu said Turkey – the only Muslim member of NATO – is trying to strike a balance between security and freedom and attempting to resolve long-simmering disputes with neighbouring countries such as Armenia.

Turkey's guiding philosophy is "peace at home and peace in the world," he said, citing a now-famous remark by one of its founders, Mustafa Kemal Ataturk.

Turkey respects all nations and does not consider any countries, including old enemies like Greece or Russia, hostile, he explained. As he put it, "We have friends and potential friends."

Concurring with the commonly held assumption that Turkey has become a major player in the Middle East, he said that no significant regional decisions can be taken without its input. "We have that ability and that right," he said.

In a reference to the revolts that have convulsed the Arab world since 2011, Davutoglu said that Turkey opposes autocratic regimes and supports "the legitimate rights of the Arab people."

He added, "We're on the side of the people. Turkey will always be on the right side of history in humanitarian and strategic terms."

He said that Turkey will use all its diplomatic means to ensure that democracy prevails in such countries as Egypt, Tunisia and Libya, where popular rebellions overthrew dictators.

Turning to Syria, where a civil war has erupted pitting the Baathist government against a diverse band of rebels, Davutoglu lambasted Syrian President Bashar Assad for not having introduced real and lasting reforms.

Decrying the failure of the United Nations to stop the bloodshed in Syria, he admitted that the presence of more than 100,000 Syrian refugees in Turkey has become a "humanitarian tragedy."

Davutoglu, the first Turkish foreign minister to visit Canada since 1998, urged Ottawa to expand bilateral ties with Ankara. "Our relationship is not developing fast enough. We're ready for deeper relations with Canada. We want to have the best relations with Canada."

He said Turkey wants to join the European Union as a full member and is prepared to wait for the day when Europe no longer rebuffs Turkish overtures.

"The European Union should be culturally inclusive and outward looking," he said, noting that Turkey, with the world's 16th largest economy, would not be an economic burden on the EU.

Young professionals raise over $65,000 for JNF

Future Party fundraiser to help kibbutz

Cara Edell

Special to The CJN

Hundreds of young professionals recently gathered at Toronto nightclub The Hoxton for a night of fun and philanthropy at the Jewish National Fund Future Party.

The Sept. 12 event raised more than $65,000 to support a security planting for Kibbutz Nir Oz in Israel's Negev desert. Bordering Gaza, Nir Oz is home to 350 residents and is exposed to frequent missile and artillery attacks.

As a safety mechanism, JNF is planting trees surrounding the area to act as green buffers to protect the community.

"The Negev is such an important part of Israel's soul, history and culture," said Lesley Glowinsky, who chaired the party with Darren Slavens and Maxim Zavet.

"Thousands of people visit this region every year, and maintaining its safety must be a priority to both Jewish and non-Jewish people around the world."

Zavet said JNF Future is unique in that it specifically targets a younger demographic "that is typically not involved in Israeli community projects and related charitable and social causes."

He said getting young people involved helps them build their networks within the community and expand them over time. "It then becomes easier to call on those networks in order to help others through charitable fundraising, social causes and community projects, and also to help themselves become pillars of their communities."

David Spevick, left, and Jeremy Spevick were among the hundreds who attended the JNF Future Party.

[Cara Edell photo]

Glowinsky said she's been involved with JNF Future for the past few years. "I personally support JNF because I know exactly where their funds are going. Whether they take on a small task like the building of a playground or a larger one like our Negev security buffer this year, the organization makes such a huge impact on the lives of Israelis."

Slavens said he wants the Canadian Jewish community to realize they can make a difference. "It's important that the outside community see young Jewish Torontonians saying loud and proud that we support Israel and always will. It's important for us to feel that pride within our own community as well."

Young Jewish adults need to realize it's their turn to step up to the plate, Slavens said. "Past and current leaders in our community have done such an amazing job strengthening Israel and our community here at home, but we need to build that next generation of leaders that will take over. I think JNF Future is the perfect vehicle to reach out."

JNF Future is "a vital part of the JNF organization as it provides a gateway to involve members of our community aged 25 to 45 and serves as part of our leadership development work," said Lance Davis, JNF Toronto executive director.

"The event chairs are individuals who are committed to JNF and the important work we do in Israel. They are dedicated to ensuring that we engage young adults into our work in order to help connect them to Israel."

This year's event featured entertainment by DJ Samantha Ronson, Filthy Gorgeous and Bangers & Mash.

Upcoming JNF events include Cook for a Cause on Oct. 14 and the Hoops Classic basketball charity tournament on Dec. 16.

Reform needs a bigger tent, new leader says

Number of unaffiliated Jews has grown since 1958

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Rick Jacobs, the new president of the Union for Reform Judaism, believes that the Reform community needs to broaden its "tent" to include the gamut of the Jewish community.

"Does our tent include ultra-Orthodox and humanistic Jews, gay and straight Jews, traditional and classical Reform Jews, Canadians and Americans, Likud and Labor, the devout and the disaffected, political conservatives and political liberals?" Rabbi Jacobs asked in his first address to a Canadian audience in his new role.

Speaking at Holy Blossom Temple on Sept. 13 about "Change and Challenge: Reform Judaism at a Crossroads," Rabbi Jacobs, who is based in New York, said that he was thrilled to see students from the temple's Introduction to Judaism class in the audience.

Among societal changes the Reform movement needs to address, Rabbi Jacobs noted that in 1958, three per cent of North Americans said they had no religious affiliation, but by 2008, that number had climbed to 17 per cent.

"Among young people in their twenties and thirties across all religious lines, the number is 30 to 40 per cent. That means a growing number of young people don't find a place for themselves in the religious world," Rabbi Jacobs said.

"The fastest growing group in Jewish life is 'unaffiliated.' There are more Jews outside our walls than inside."

Hebrew school is not working, he added. "There are notable exceptions, but 80 per cent of our young people drop out between bar mitzvah and 12th grade."

This year, at his own initiative, Rabbi Jacobs is leading Reform High Holiday services at Brown University. He wanted to "figure out why there are 1,300 [Jewish] students at Brown and only a couple hundred come to High Holiday services... We have to find new ways to do this holy work."

Other changes that need to be addressed, according to Rabbi Jacobs, include existential threats to Israel and the Jewish people, a growing aging population, and the use of technology.

"Technology changes everything," he said, citing a new web-based curriculum called Mitkadem as one way the URJ is addressing change.

In Israel, he noted, "there are more Israelis who identify with our movement than with the ultra-Orthodox. Over 60 per cent of Israelis believe it's a matter of justice to make Israel the inclusive country that we need."

In his remarks, Rabbi Jacobs paid tribute to Holy Blossom and its current and past leaders, including the late Rabbi Maurice Eisendrath, the first president of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, the URJ's predecessor. Rabbi Eisendrath served from 1943 until his death in 1973, and was responsible for creating the North American Federation of Temple Youth (NFTY), the Reform movement's youth arm.

The URJ has almost 900 affiliated congregations in North America, including 25 in Canada.

Enrolment up at Winnipeg's Gray Academy

Declining numbers in other Jewish programs

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — For the fourth year in row, the Winnipeg Board of Jewish Education's Gray Academy has seen an increase in enrolment.

"Our growth is a testament to the quality of our product and the excellence of our teachers," said head of school and CEO Rory Paul. "The Gray Academy is the school of choice for our Jewish community."

With just under 625 students this year, enrolment is up almost 10 per cent over 2009.

In addition, Paul said, the school has a 97 per cent retention rate of students who attended last year. The kindergarten to Grade 12 school, he noted, opened three new classrooms — one each at the kindergarten, Grade 1 and Grade 2 levels — to accommodate the additional student numbers.

"Our attendance is above projections," he said. "We still have a waiting list, but it is wonderful that we were able to take some children off the waiting list."

Half the new students are from recently arrived families, primarily from Israel, while the others are local children new to the Gray Academy, Paul said.

Gray Academy is also hosting three foreign students (from Brazil and Mexico), with a fourth expected to start in February. The students are housed with local Jewish families.

Only about 50 per cent of the students pay full tuition, Paul said. The BJE has a sliding scale based on family income and the number of students per family enrolled in the school. He acknowledged the generous financial support of the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg, which helps pay for students who can't afford the full tuition, and he added that all private schools in Manitoba receive provincial government funding accounting for about 70 per cent of their needs.

Winnipeg has also been home, for more than 30 years, to two Hebrew bilingual kindergarten to Grade 6 programs in the public school system. The outlook is not quite as positive for them as for Gray Academy.

In north Winnipeg, Margaret Park School, which houses the original Hebrew bilingual program, has an enrolment of just 38 children this year (at its peak 20 years ago, the program numbered about 180 students), and it is beginning to be phased out. Principal Cynthia Dutton reported that this is the last year for the kindergarten class — just four children were enrolled — and each year, there will be one less grade offered.

"We feel good about our program this year, and we will do our best for our remaining students as long as they are with us," she said.

The enrolment is also decreasing at the Hebrew bilingual program at Brock Corydon Elementary School in south Winnipeg. For years, the program at Brock Corydon was filled to capacity with about 180 students. However, enrolment dropped to 136 in 2010, and to 122 last year. This year, there are about 100 students, 15 of them in kindergarten.

Part of the problem for Brock Corydon is that many immigrant families are settling in areas of the city outside the Winnipeg 1 School Division catchment area, which Brock Corydon is part of. Margaret Park School is part of the Seven Oaks School Division.

One problem facing both Hebrew bilingual programs is that most of the Jewish immigrants who have come to Winnipeg in recent years are from Israel, and the Hebrew-speaking families are choosing to enrol their children in public schools. They don't see the need to have their children attend Hebrew-language programs.

What's Their Adventure?

Antisemitic flyers target Winnipeg mayor

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Police are investigating after antisemitic flyers were posted around downtown Winnipeg on the Friday before Rosh Hashanah.

The flyers, titled "Shitler's List," allege that since Mayor Sam Katz — Winnipeg's first Jewish mayor and the main target of the poster — was elected in 2004, "hundreds of millions of dollars have been funnelled from city hall into the pockets of [13 named individuals] through untendered contracts and shady land deals"

Nearly all the 13 names on the list are Jewish. Members of the Asper family and Arni Thorsteinson, who is not Jewish, are on the list. Both the Aspers and Thorsteinson have been involved with the Canadian Museum for Human Rights, slated to open here in 2014.

Most of the others who were named are involved in property development.

The flyer added that "the gross misconduct of the mayor's office and city hall has gone on for too long. Firegate is the final straw that will break their backs."

"When the harsh light of scrutiny of the auditor general and the RCMP are turned towards city hall, Sam Katz will be facing hard time at Stony Mountain [prison] and his cabal of cockroaches will be ditching their dirty money and running for cover."

The flyers allude to a recent controversy swirling around Katz and city hall regarding a couple of questionable land deals.

"Firegate" refers to an exchange of three pieces of city-owned land for one larger plot owned by a major Jewish developer who is a close friend of the mayor.

The swap initiated by a deputy fire chief. Two of the city-owned parcels of land were occupied by mothballed fire stations, and a new, larger fire station is slated to be built on the larger plot.

Most city councillors were unaware of the deal beforehand and are questioning how a deputy fire chief could have approved it without council's oversight.

Under city rules, deals under $5 million don't need to be vetted by council. But while the original deal involving all three parcels of city-owned land was valued at about $15 million, the parcels were later broken up and sold in three separate deals. The matter is being investigated.

Katz flew to New York right after Rosh Hashanah on city business and was unavailable for comment.

But in an earlier statement, he expressed his "extreme sadness that an individual, or group of individuals, posted such material."

"I have faith that the people of Winnipeg will not support such malice," he said.

Bob Freedman, executive director of the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg, said the flyers were especially upsetting for those whose names appeared on it, but he agreed that Winnipeg is a very tolerant city.

"Whoever is behind this obviously didn't put a lot of thought and creativity into it," Freedman said of the posters. "He probably pulled something off the Internet and added the names."

Winnipeg police took down the flyers shortly after they were posted on telephone poles downtown.

"We are hoping that the police will be able to find the person or people who were behind this," Freedman said. "But this will be difficult to trace."

The Winnipeg police hate crimes unit is reportedly looking into the matter.

Anti-film riots reflect deeper currents

In the immediate aftermath of the violent protests that began in Libya on Sept. 11 and spread through much of the Muslim world in reaction to a crass U.S.-based movie trailer mocking the prophet Muhammad, the following editorial comments were typical:

- "Religious fundamentalists, moderates and liberal secularists are all jockeying for power in Middle East nations after the Arab Spring. The violence done [against the Americans in Benghazi] was apparently the work of a relatively small group of radicals not associated with any legitimate protest." — New York Times

- "The riots serve the interests of the Islamic radicals who are jockeying for power in Egypt, Libya, Yemen and beyond." "The mob has not taken over in the Arab world, but there are provocateurs hoping it will." — Globe and Mail

- "In this age of religious extremism and globalized hate, isolated bigots and killers have an exaggerated ability to define the clash of civilizations. We shouldn't let them: Just as [the producer of the film] does not represent western civilization, Libya's murderers do not represent Islam." — National Post

What they all shared in common can be summarized this way:

- The protests were not spontaneous widespread outbursts, but were an organized campaign by small radical political elements bent on influencing the outcome of the Arab Spring.
- These radicals do not represent the majority, where there is growing democratic pluralism.
- It is, therefore, wrong to view these protests as indicative of a "clash of civilizations" or clash of values between Islam and the West.

What was largely missed was a recognition of the deeper forces at play. While it's true that radicals took advantage of the "film" and fanned the flames of outrage, it's wrong to conclude that the outrage and intolerance were confined to the radicals — the Salafists — alone. There's a pattern of behaviour going back to Salman Rushdie affair, the Muhammad cartoons, etc., that expresses a far more widely held attitude within societies where there is no genuine tradition of individually based free speech.

Among the first to remark about this was the CBC's Neil Macdonald, who wrote the following on cbc.ca (Sept. 16): "Most of those rioting do not understand, or care about, the concept of free speech. That is evident in the widespread demands — including one from the Islamist president of Egypt — that America make the offending video disappear and punish its authors."

"Such calls are understandable, given that in many parts of the world, and not just Islamic nations, governments simply stamp out speech and imprison or just do away with the offending author."

Macdonald faulted the Obama administration for trying to suppress anti-Islamic propaganda that the American government had nothing to do with. He specifically criticized the White House for prevailing upon Google to take the trailer off YouTube.

Macdonald's take on this was blunt: "So, rather than trying to explain one of its bedrock, founding principles [free speech], the American government is sounding instead as though it sympathizes with those who would censor and punish blasphemy." While Macdonald remarked that it may be unfair to say that Obama is "apologizing for America," it's not unfair to say that he's "allowing America to be bullied by zealots."

In her Sept. 18 Globe and Mail column, Margaret Wenthe summed up what others, such as the Islamic scholar Fouad Ajami (on CNN), are once again calling a clash of values: "In the wake of the protests, many western commentators have pointed out that we all have extremists in our midst, and although there's no excuse for violence, it's reprehensible to rile people up by insulting their religion. This fake equivalency ignores the essential point, which is that the Muslim world abhors the crime of blasphemy far more than it values religious freedom or secularism or free speech. Any challenge to the Prophet or the Holy Book is cause for outrage."

Certainly one challenge for the Arab Spring is to see whether any other future for free speech is even possible.

Rabbi takes Sukkot to dizzying heights

Cara Stern
Special to The CJN

A Toronto rabbi will be marking 25 years celebrating Sukkot 12 storeys above the ground.

Rabbi Catriel Blum will once again enjoy the holiday in his sukkah, located on the balcony of his top-floor apartment at 2900 Bathurst St., south of Lawrence Avenue.

"I tell people it's like eating on the CN Tower, except the food is kosher," he jokes.

He says he can see for almost 50 kilometres – as far as Pickering and Richmond Hill – and with binoculars, he can glimpse the Skylon Tower in Niagara Falls.

He has built the sukkah, which he says can comfortably fit four, every year for the past 25 years.

It takes Rabbi Blum roughly 30 hours to put together the plywood and bolts that hold the structure together, so he begins the process about a month before Rosh Hashanah.

He says he has used the same wood for all 25 years.

Although the construction has remained the same, some things have changed. His sukkah now boasts venetian blinds, a stereo system and a Wi-Fi connection.

View from Rabbi Blum's sukkah.

The inside of Rabbi Blum's sukkah

He has mastered the art of building a tough sukkah, and says he has never had one fall.

The only problem is the wind, which he describes as almost hurricane-like.

"The wind downstairs is not the wind upstairs," he says. "The sukkah has to be built stronger than any house on the ground."

The sukkah's frame is made of two-by-fours that are screwed into the building and the balcony railing. Altogether, there are 400 screws.

It needs to be strong, Rabbi Blum says, "because if anything falls off, it falls onto Bathurst Street."

He recalls one Sukkot 24 years ago when somebody ran to him in shul to let him know that his sukkah was falling down. There was wood all over Bathurst Street – but it wasn't from his sukkah.

The biggest change he's noticed over the past several decades is the weather. He recalls one time 40 years ago when he found refuge from the snow in a sukkah.

Nowadays, he jokes, he needs an air conditioner in his structure – although he has no plans to install one, given that the holiday is only eight days long.

Despite the lack of air conditioning, Rabbi Blum says he's looking forward to spending the holiday in what may be the highest sukkah in the city.

"It's really a real thrill to be in there," he says.

Israel in the Byzantine Period

The Byzantine period is one of the least-known periods in the history of ancient Israel. It lasted from the permanent division of the Roman Empire into its eastern and western halves after the death of the Emperor Theodosius in 395 CE, until the Arab conquest in 638.

There are a number of important and impressive archeological remains in Israel from this often-overlooked period. Some of the key sites that we are familiar with from earlier eras continued to flourish during this time. Places such as Jerusalem and Caesarea Maritima come to mind. One of the best-known representations that we have of Jerusalem is the Madaba mosaic, which dates to the reign of the Byzantine Emperor Justinian during the middle of the sixth century CE.

This mosaic, discovered in the town of Madaba in Jordan, shows us what Jerusalem looked like during the Byzantine era. It has proven to be an invaluable tool for scholars studying the topography of Jerusalem in the Byzantine period.

Caesarea continued to be an important site during Byzantine times. It had a spectacular hippodrome (known to the Romans as a circus maximus), racetrack for chariots.

It was a sport that continued in popularity from Roman times. One has to only look at the chariot-racing scene from the movie Ben Hur to appreciate the grandeur of such an event.

I worked on the excavations of the hippodrome at Caesarea in 1976. We had the imposing outline of the hippodrome but almost none of its massive remains. What happened to this massive structure was a mystery that plagued us throughout the season, but it was a mystery that we were determined to solve.

After laying out and excavating numerous explormath Gader, which originally dated to the Roman period but was expanded in the 5th century during Byzantine rule. This was a massive complex. It has recently been turned into a popular spa and recreation centre.

This past summer, the excavations at Tel Huqoq in the Galilee, in which the University of Toronto's Archaeology Centre has been involved (thanks to the sponsorship of the Centre for Jewish Studies and the Canadian Institute for Mediterranean Studies) has uncovered a synagogue with an impressive mosaic floor dating to this era.

At one time, it was thought that there was not much of a Jewish presence left in Israel after the two disastrous revolts against Rome.

Ongoing excavations have disproved that idea. Many synagogues dating to the Byzantine period have been found, showing that there was a large Jewish population in Israel throughout this era. It was during this time that they produced one of our greatest accomplishments – the Palestinian Talmud.

Past Forward

atory trenches throughout that summer, we finally figured out the mystery of the hippodrome's disappearance. Apparently, it had been dismantled in 605 CE in anticipation of a Persian invasion, and its stones were used to build a defensive wall around the perimeter of Caesarea to keep the Persians out.

Another impressive Byzantine site was found at the baths of Ham-

Sukkah DIY

If ever you've wanted to release your inner (Jewish) handyman/woman, there's no time like the present. Sukkot is almost here and rather than shell out for a pre-fab kit, why not consider building one yourself? Plans abound online, as do people who would be happy to have you walk in their footsteps.

One of the groundbreaking publications for taking Judaism into your own hands is The Jewish Catalogue: A Do-It-Yourself Kit. These classic sukkah plans are reprinted online. And there's also a link to a "quick and easy do-it-yourself sukkah that uses piping from your local home improvement store." (<http://bit.ly/sukkah102>)

Wow! Jerome Danoff of Congregation Beth El of Bethesda has really outdone himself. He has uploaded a 24-page (!) pdf with extremely detailed instructions for building an eight-by-eight-foot sukkah. And then, if you have time – and space, you can try out the Instructions for Adding a Sukkah Extension to convert to an eight by 12 feet. (<http://bit.ly/sukkah106>) And if you're looking for more legroom, Gary Garb has provided plans for an eight-by-16-foot sukkah. (<http://bit.ly/sukkah104>)

This site claims you can Build a Sukkah for Under $40. Rabbi David Seidenberg writes, "Sukkah kits cost upwards of a few hundred dollars! A homespun sukkah is way better, for the Earth, for the wallet and for the spirit." His caption under a photo of his sukkah: "This is the sukkah frame I made according to this plan, still standing at Purim after a half winter." (<http://bit.ly/sukkah105>)

And if time is at a premium, architect Tom Norris has provided plans and advice on "How To Build a Sukkah in 30 Minutes." I should add that architect Tom Norris practices his trade – and built that sukkah – in sunny Scottsdale, Ariz.

Jewish & Digital

Mark Mietkiewicz

(<http://bit.ly/sukkah108>)

Why settle for a sukkah that has three or four rectangular walls, when you can build ones that are shaped like a "polyhedron with eight triangular faces?" Without a doubt, the plans for the most unique sukkah I came across online is KOSHO, an entry in New York's 2010 Sukkah City Competition. (<http://bit.ly/sukkah111>) Imagine massive triangular walls, each one of which has several plans fanning out from one corner to the opposite base. After assembling these triangles, you create a structure that, when viewed from above, takes on the shape of a Star of David. Although the shape is unorthodox, a note on the site explains that KOSHO is kosher and meets halachic requirements. (<http://bit.ly/sukkah112>)

And that brings me to the next site, which explains the basic halachot for building a sukkah. It includes the critical rules about size and location, and about the makeup of the schach, which forms the roof or canopy. (<http://bit.ly/sukkah101>)

No matter how skilled you are, while taking on a project like this, things can sometimes go awry.

That's when you want to take advantage of the sukkah plans – and generous offer – courtesy Rabbi Yechiel Baiteiman at Chabad of Richmond, B.C.: "Free advice in case you run into problems, click here." (<http://bit.ly/sukkah113>)

Whether you build one from a kit, dine at your neighbour's or DIY, have a wonderful time in your sukkah.

Sukkot: low tech to high design

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl

On Sukkot, Jews go from fast to feast, from people unsure about how to use a hammer to short-lived Home Depot experts. We go beyond our comfort zone, from secure and dry residences to short-term shacks, exposed to the elements. We leave the private and protected space of our synagogues to go where strangers see our sukkot and wonder about these huts.

Again this year, the Kehilla Residential Program of Toronto will sponsor Sukkahville, a unique competition that transformed the low-tech sukkah into high design and positioned the modest hut within the public square. Kehilla, with the support of many volunteers and sponsors, sponsors Sukkahville with the goal of raising awareness about and funds for housing issues in our own community.

A sukkah is an ephemeral, elemental shelter, erected for just over one week each fall. It's available to share meals, entertain, sleep and rejoice. Its religious function is to commemorate the temporary structures that the Israelites dwelled in following their Exodus from Egypt. It's a distinguishing and distinctive ritual of the Jewish people.

But the sukkah is also about the universal themes of transience and eternity. Deeply rooted in agriculture and land, it also serves as an enactment of impermanence. The sukkah expresses empathy with the homeless, offers a reminder of harvest and evokes a memory of the wilderness sojourn.

A sukkah must be temporary, have at least 2-1/2 walls, be big enough to contain a human torso, and have a roof made of organic materials. It should be at least one metre tall, and the roof can't be more than 18 feet above the base. The sukkah must provide more shadow than sun-your House will flourish." In addition to our own personal experience, spiritual flourishing comes from being attuned to the totality of life – global sustainability and the construction of a just and compassionate society.

Our Torah teachings can engage society and the world on important issues. In Toronto, people live on the street or in temporary shelters all the time. Ve'ahava will host a dinner in a sukkah. Habitat for Humanity is a partner with Sukkahville, because the sukkah reminds us of the importance of affordable housing for our community.

Sukkahville also calls us to restore balance to our lives. We need to breathe the air, take time to be outdoors, and restore a connection to land and water. If Sukkot is about sustainable living, it's also a challenge to control consumption.

Whether it's our simple sukkot or the innovative ones of Sukkahville, the vision is the same: to reach from the simple to the sublime, to use the temporary to aspire to the eternal, and to renew the ancient with contemporary creativity. By doing all this, we shall sanctify and sustain our lives here on earth.

Rabbi Frydman-Kohl is senior rabbi at Beth Tzedec Congregation in Toronto.

Rabbinic Reflections

light, yet allow those within to peek through the covering to see the stars.

Sukkahville 2012 wants to see how inventive architects and designers can be within the limits of Jewish law. Can they produce a structure that's new and old, contemporary and classical, open and enclosed, heimish and yet wholly different? There are more than 140 registrants and more than 40 submissions to this juried competition. The finalists will be on display in Mel Lastman Square from Sept. 30 to Oct. 3. They won't be your zaide's sukkot.

Our Torah tradition imagined Sukkot as having a message for the world. In the most beloved biblical Psalm, we say: "Those who dwell in What's that sound?

The High Holidays have come and gone, and aside from the recurring themes of repentance and destiny, there was also a recurring sound: the shofar blasts. It's a sound that's quite unique, and we crave a good, solid, strong and lasting shofar blast. For that instant, the ram's horn speaks for us and carries our prayers and thoughts upward far beyond where we can imagine.

Going back to the earliest of our ancestors, to Abraham, the ram's horn is intrinsically connected with sacrifice. As Abraham decides not to sacrifice his son Isaac on the altar to God, he looks for a substitute and finds a ram caught in a bush by its horns. The ram is sacrificed instead, and the ram's horn becomes the shofar that Jews hold sacred to this day. The messages are quite complex.

On the one hand, Abraham was ready to sacrifice his son Isaac to God, yet he ultimately creates a substitute, and the message becomes a new message. It's as if Abraham, and we, are saying to God that although we're willing to do whatever you ask of us, we beg you to find another way and ask something else, because some things will crush us. There's a midrash that relates a conversation between Isaac and Abraham in which Isaac asks his father how Sarah, our matriarch, as she stands at the bottom of the mountain weeping and sobbing, begging for Abraham and God to stop. They are her cries that we send upward with the shofar.

Yet another midrash tells us that the sounds of the shofar are unlike those of any other wind instrument. It's not that the shofar itself produces such a unique sound, for any animal horn could reproduce it. On the contrary: the sages say that the sound of the shofar is unique because it's an intimate sound. The person blowing the shofar, not the instrument itself, creates the intimacy.

As the Talmud says: "Happy is the people that know the trumpet blast." They know how to seduce their Creator with the blast of the ram's horn, so that He rises from the Throne of Judgment and goes to the Throne of Mercy, and He is filled with compassion for them, and turns the aspect of judgment to the aspect of mercy.

Amen.

he will explain to his mother that he has killed his son. Abraham asks Isaac why he thinks Abraham will live through this event. We blow the shofar on the High Holidays to remind God that our destinies are at stake and if the Divine plan includes something we might not bear, we ask God to find another way.

Another midrash tells us that the sounds of the shofar are the cries of

JVS Toronto and Ryerson build on partnership

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

In the 65 years since Jewish Vocational Services (JVS) Toronto was founded, the non-profit organization has continued to evolve and reach out to other organizations that can help in its mission to assist immigrants overcome employment and educational barriers.

Sheldon Levy

At JVS Toronto's annual general meeting earlier this month at Shaarei Tefillah Congregation, Ryerson University president Sheldon Levy pledged his commitment to the partnership that has formed between Ryerson and JVS Toronto.

Throughout his address, Levy highlighted how his school prepares people for employment and builds careers, and touched on the joint collaborations Ryerson has with JVS Toronto.

One of the programs that ran for the first time last year is called Immigrant Professionals Leveraging Architectural Knowledge for New Opportunities (I-Plan).

JVS Toronto partnered with Ryerson, as well as the Ontario Tourism Education Council, and the Career Edge Organization, to create a bridge-training program designed for internationally educated professionals in architecture.

I-Plan is a 14-week program that offers those with an international education and work experience in architecture, with an opportunity to gain the knowledge and skills to integrate into the Canadian architectural workforce.

tural workforce.

The next session starts in January 2013, and those who qualify can apply in October by contacting iplan@jvstontoronto.org.

Another program that has JVS Toronto and Ryerson working together is called Integrated Pre-arrival Services Online (IPSO).

This government-funded partnership project provides online services including language training and mentoring for people who were professionally trained outside of Canada and plan to immigrate here.

The program helps newcomers integrate into the Canadian labour market more efficiently.

JVS Toronto CEO Frank Markel said he and his staff are motivated to introduce new programs and build partnerships because "we recognize the tremendous need we see in our community."

Markel said he's inspired by "new immigrants, wanting to bring their considerable skills to the Canadian workplace, people... who are determined to break through the barriers that confront them, and those who seek the guidance and insight that our psychological and educational services can provide."

Of course, he added, JVS Toronto is not able to provide the programs needed to serve the community alone.

"What we have come to realize is that education and employment are inextricably linked. Better education leads to better jobs," Markel said.

"We know employment, and Ryerson knows education. Put the two together and we believe we will have something special."

Outgoing JVS Toronto chair Ruth Abrahamson, - who is being replaced by Paul Habert - also spoke of Ryerson as an "exciting and growing partner."

"We share many of the same goals - namely to build a strong, vibrant and skilled workforce. We have complementary expertise and we are keen to put our collective talents together to ensure greater successes."

For more information about the programs and partnerships, visit www.jvstontoronto.org.

Bronfman foundation to close in 2016

Bronfman, 81, who has lived in New York for about 15 years, is now on the list of 92 wealthy American individuals. Bronfman has never become an American citizen.

Edgar Bronfman, a U.S. and Canadian citizen, earlier joined the movement.

Canadian Business magazine, in its 2011 ranking of the wealthiest Canadians, put Bronfman's worth at $2.37 billion. An heir of the Seagram's distillery fortune, Bronfman's principal business interests today are in the entertainment conglomerate Vivendi and in investing.

The foundation he and his late wife, Andrea, founded in 1986 will close in 2016, he writes in his letter on the Giving Pledge website.

"My children [Stephen of Montreal and Ellen Hauptman of New York and London] have their own foundations and philanthropy interests, as it should be. And I had and have no intent to 'rule from the grave.' My philanthropy will continue on a personal basis."

Bronfman, the son of Samuel Bronfman, writes that philanthropy is "in the DNA of my family" and his own efforts began early.

At 17, he started canvassing for the United Jewish Appeal.

"I collected 50 cents from 20 peers in poor Jewish area of Montreal. While I knew I could easily pay the $10 myself and claim it came from them, I relished meeting those who were in lesser circumstances and yet still wanted to participate in helping others."

The Andrea and Charles Bronfman Philanthropies (ACBP) was created to support innovative projects designed to enhance Canadian identity and Jewish identity and unity, as well as informal education in Israel. Donations are supplementary to the couple's regular philanthropic giving.

Among the projects the foundation has helped initiate are the Canadian heritage television spots and Birthright Israel, which organizes free trips to Israel for young Jews.

Andrea Bronfman died in 2006.

Steps are being taken to ensure the many projects ACBP incubated will carry on.

Seniors take to the stage at Baycrest

21-member group presents musical revue

Gila Martow
Special to The CJN

A group of seniors aged 85 to 100 recently presented a program of Jewish song and folklore at the Terraces of Baycrest.

The 21-member group, the Baycrest Terraces Musical Theatre (BTMT), has performed shows about Jewish holidays and themes since November 2010.

Musical theatre is the "best medicine we can give the residents – both for the performers and the observers," said BTMT member Sylvia Banack. She is almost 92 years old and lives at the Terraces.

Yankle Gladstone is the 87-year-old resident who founded BTMT. He wrote, directed and choreographed the group's latest show, performed on Sept. 12.

Terraces resident Dora Gladstone is not related to Yankle Gladstone, but she considers herself his "soul sister." She is a passionate supporter of the theatre group. "He pulls a lot of people in who would have nothing else to do. They come to his rehearsals and enjoy participating. He was always a teacher and will always be a teacher," she said.

The seniors at Baycrest enjoy performances given by schoolchildren and community organizations, but they would like people to know that they are also able – and willing – to be participants in programming.

Sylvia Stippleman, 88, lives at 2 Neptune Drive, an independent-living seniors building managed by Baycrest that has regular shuttle service to the Terraces and other neighbourhood destinations. She sang with Yankle Gladstone as a youth in Montreal and continues to wow audiences with her talent. Stippleman said she considers the time and energy devoted by Gladstone to the programming at the Terraces to be "an act of heroism."

While some directors might become frustrated by the array of walkers and canes used by his performers, Gladstone creatively includes them as props. A program on the Yiddish fables of the village of Chelm that took place last spring featured a shtetl wedding scene with a chupah held up by four canes.

Bess Benovy, 95, played the bride with groom, Sonny Breger, 10 months her junior. Benovy glowed while recounting her bridal role and chuckled at the fact that a romance blossomed and they are "still a couple."

Typically, parents and grandparents are audience members at school and extracurricular performances, but the BTMT performance reverses this trend, with many children and grandchildren as audience members.

Joli Chester, one of the soloists in the Sept. 12 show, was cheered on by her granddaughter, Chana Zeldman, who was visiting from Israel.

"We were sitting with my grandmother in her apartment," recalled Zeldman, "when she suddenly ran out to go to her rehearsal."

"Without Yankle, we would not have this choir," Chester said. "We are like a family – a group that loves to meet even if we are not rehearsing for a show."

New Reena apartment offers community living

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

With the official opening of the Reena Community Residence at the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus on Sept. 14, Reena has come light years from its origins, says CEO Sandy Keshen.

"When Reena started up almost 40 years ago, we [operated from basements]. This building is an example of our journey. We've come a long way," said Keshen, who has been with Reena since 1967.

The new residence, the first of its kind in North America, provides housing for up to 84 people with varying needs, including physical, mental health and developmental disabilities, women and children in crisis and the elderly. Reena's major partners in the venture are Kehilla Residential Programme, Circle of Care and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Support staff are available around the clock, a feature that's built into the cost of the rent, and families contribute to the support system, she said.

The residence, which offers one-, two- or three-bedroom apartments, includes a greenhouse, a literacy centre and a multi-purpose room for residents and their families. A dedicated space that simulates a real-life apartment where residents can learn to care for themselves in a safe and nurturing environment has also been created.

Another unique feature is the Maxwell and Ruth Leroy Holocaust Remembrance Garden, which will convey how hundreds of thousands of people with physical, mental or developmental disabilities were victims of the Holocaust.

Government funding for the project includes $4.2 million from the Canada-Ontario Affordable Housing Program. Federal and provincial funding was complemented by more than $1.1 million in municipal financial incentives, and $2.6 million was provided by the Ministry of Community and Social Services.

Keshen said Reena Foundation also raised about $6.8 million for the building, and is still raising endowment funds.

The idea for the project, she said, "came from my head. I started with the idea of creating an integrated apartment building, but [I knew] we would have to start from scratch, because we can't evict current residents of a building."

When the land was bought for the Lebovic campus, she said, she approached UJA Federation to see if it would be possible to build on the site, and "that was that."

New residents, many of whom attended the opening along with representatives from all levels of government, "are so proud to have a building of their own. They have the right to quality of life, and they will not be stigmatized there. They will also have the whole community right at their fingertips. Integration is pivotal. They have to be part of society," Keshen said.

"They also have to learn how to live in a community and be respectful of others. The campus provides part of that learning, because they can volunteer at [the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto] or attend programs at the Schwartz-Reisman Centre. This building offers them visibility in the community. It's a continuation of what Reena has been doing for 40 years."

She said she's "just overjoyed to see the first residents slowly moving in," and there are still some vacancies.

A time to remember

The Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, the Holocaust Martyrs' and Heroes' Remembrance Authority, held its 20th annual Yizkor ceremony at Earl Bales Park on Sept. 23. In addition to candlelighting and laying wreaths in memory of Holocaust victims, Jewish partisans and ghetto fighters, and of Holocaust survivors who have since died, the ceremony included the launch of the Remember, Reflect, Recommit campaign, which aims to revitalize the society's memorial site at Earl Bales to maximize the site's commemorative and educational potential. Also part of the program were readings and a choir performance by students of Bialik Hebrew Day School, the recitation of Kaddish, and the blowing of the shofar. [Carolyn Blackman photos]

Events planned for entire year

She is planning a year-long series of events – “because I know no one-shot deal works – to educate both staff and students. I feel any student is suffering twice – from the illness and from the lack of understanding.”

Her first initiative, last June, was a professional development day for TanenbaumCHAT staff on eating disorders and anxiety, with speakers Leanne Needham, co-ordinator of family and youth programs for the Mood Disorders Association of Ontario, and Dr. Cathleen Steinegger, medical director of the Eating Disorders Program at the Hospital for Sick Children.

Other aspects of the project include a Grade 9 trip to see the film Bully next month, and a talk by a representative of Kids Help Phone in November. A presentation by MADD Canada about drinking and driving took place earlier this month.

“I want the staff and the kids to understand that we're all very sympathetic with a broken leg,” Klompas said, “and we've got to be just as sympathetic with the illnesses we can't see.”

Sweet or peppery, kugel adds a special touch

Eileen Goltz
Special to The CJN

Ask half a dozen Jewish cooks how they make their kugels and you'll probably get a dozen answers. Some differences are regional. Others occur because recipes have been handed down through the generations with each generation adding its own special take on what to add.

One particularly scrumptious kugel that's a favourite in my house is a sweet peppery kugel called Yerushalmi, or Jerusalem, kugel. Supposedly Yerushalmi kugel originated in Jerusalem with followers of the Gaon of Vilna, a late 18th-century Jewish scholar. Made with thin noodles, pepper, salt and sugar, it's tricky because it has a caramel base that can stick or burn.

However, no matter which of the following kugel recipes you choose to set before your guests, know for a certainty that they're all worthy of being served again and again and again.

YERUSHALMI KUGEL

Deliciously sweet and incredibly spicy.

- 1 12-oz. package thin egg noodles
- 4 eggs
- 1 tsp. salt
- 2 tsp. ground black pepper
- 1 1/2 cups sugar
- 1/2 cup oil

Cook egg noodles according to package directions. Strain and set aside to cool.

In a small saucepan, dissolve the sugar and oil over low heat. Cook until sugar turns medium brown, stirring occasionally (this should take about 20 minutes). Immediately pour caramelized sugar over cooled noodles, and stir with wooden spoon to separate lumps (some will remain and this is okay, sugar will re-melt during baking). Let cool to room temperature so as not to cook eggs.

Mix eggs with salt and pepper and add to noodle mixture. Mix well. Preheat oven to 350. Pour into the 9x13 pan. Cover the pan with foil and bake for 1/2 hour. Remove the foil and bake an additional 1/2 hour. Serves 8 to 10.

ONION AND NOODLE KUGEL

This dish is a modified version of a recipe created by Susan Belsinger, a member of Les Dames d'Escoffier.

- 1 lb. wide egg noodles
- 2 tbsp. olive oil
- 2 tsp. minced garlic

- 1 tbsp. margarine
- 1 lb. onions, peeled, quartered lengthwise and cut cross-wise 1/4-in. thick
- 2 cups milk
- 1 cup small-curd cottage cheese
- 2 extra-large eggs, lightly beaten
- 1 tsp. salt
- about 1/2 tsp. freshly ground pepper
- 1/3 cup plus 2 tbsp. freshly grated Parmesan cheese
- 1/2 tsp. paprika
- few dashes cayenne pepper
- 2 tsp. fresh marjoram or thyme or 3/4 tsp. dried marjoram or thyme
- 1/2 cup chopped parsley
- 2 tbsp. fresh snipped chives or green onions
- 3/4 cup dried breadcrumbs

Cook the noodles al dente, toss them with about 1 tbsp. of olive oil and the garlic. Season with salt and pepper. Preheat oven to 375.

Grease a 2-quart dish and set it aside. In a large sauté pan, heat the butter and remaining one tbsp. olive oil over medium heat. Add the onions and sauté, stirring occasionally, for about 10 minutes.

While the onions are cooking, in a large bowl combine the milk, cottage cheese, eggs, salt, pepper, 1/3 cup of parmesan, paprika, cayenne, marjoram or thyme, parsley and chives and blend until the ingredients are well mixed. Add the cooked noodles to the bowl, along with the sautéed onions, and stir well to combine.

Transfer the mixture to the prepared dish. Sprinkle the breadcrumbs with the remaining Parmesan over the top of the kugel. Bake for 15 minutes, reduce the heat to 325 and bake for 25 minutes longer. Remove from oven and serve hot. Serves 8 to 10 as a first course or side dish, 4 to 6 as a main dish.

POTATO CARROT AND ZUCCHINI KUGEL

Carrots, zucchini and two kinds of onions add colour and flavour to this recipe.

- 5 eggs
- 3 medium onions, peeled, cut into 1-in. pieces, divided
- 14 green onions, coarsely chopped, divided
- 5 8-oz. russet potatoes, peeled, cut into 1-in. cubes, divided
- 2 medium carrots, peeled, cut into 1-in. pieces, divided
- 1 large zucchini, trimmed, cut into 1-in. pieces, divided
- 1/2 cup matzah meal or bread crumbs
- 2 1/2 tsp. salt
- 1/2 tsp. freshly ground black pepper
- 1/2 cup (1 stick) melted margarine or vegetable oil, divided

Position rack in top third of oven and preheat to 400. Combine 3 eggs, half of onions and half of green onions in processor. Blend until mixture is almost smooth and fluffy. Add half of potatoes, half of carrots, and half of zucchini.

Blend until vegetables are finely chopped (bits of carrots and zucchini will remain). Transfer mixture to large bowl. Repeat with remaining 2 eggs, onions, and green onions, then potatoes, carrots, and zucchini. Add to mixture in bowl.

Whisk in matzah meal, 2-1/2 tsp. salt, and 1/2 tsp. pepper, then 1/4 cup margarine.

Brush remaining 1/4 cup margarine over bottom and sides of 13x9x2-in. glass baking dish. Place the prepared dish in oven until very hot, about 7 minutes. Remove the empty dish and pour the kugel batter into the hot dish. Bake until top is brown and crisp, about 1 hour. Serves 8.

Protests greet Ahmadinejad ahead of UN speech

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad was once again greeted by protests this week in response to his annual address to the UN General Assembly in New York.

In the run-up to his Sept. 26 speech – which took place on Yom Kippur – numerous groups and individuals objected to Ahmadinejad's visit, with some urging the UN to ban the controversial leader, who is known for Holocaust denial and has called for Israel's destruction.

As it has in previous sessions, the Canadian delegation to the UN planned to walk out as soon as Ahmadinejad took the dais.

"We absolutely will not be listening to his speech," Rick Roth, press secretary for Foreign Affairs Minister John Baird, told The C/N prior to the speech.

Last week, Liberal MP Irwin Cotler called on UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon and U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton to bar the Iranian president from addressing the UN.

"Let there be no mistake about it: a person who pursues the most destructive of weaponry in violation of UN Security Council resolutions, who incites to genocide, who is complicit in crimes against humanity, who is engaged in a massive repression of the human rights of his own citizens, who assaults the basic tenets of the UN Charter – such a person should be the object of an indictment by this international body, rather than the beneficiary of its respected podium," Cotler wrote in letters to both Ban and Clinton.

Asked whether the Canadian government would join Cotler's call, Roth responded: "No government in the world has spoken more clearly and forcefully against the racist and antisemitic regime in Tehran than Canada. And we have followed these words with tough action."

Canada shuttered its embassy in Tehran and expelled all Iranian embassy staff from Ottawa earlier this month.

Sayeh Hassan a Toronto lawyer and Iranian pro-democracy activist told The C/N she was disappointed that the UN still allows the current Iranian regime to have a voice at the world forum.

"By doing so, [it gives] the Islamic regime a much needed credibility boost," she said. "For many years pro-democracy activists both inside and outside of Iran have asked the international community to politically isolate the regime. I believe this is the best way to weaken it while putting very minimal, if any, pressure on the Iranian people."

Hassan also praised Canada for closing its embassy in Iran, calling the move a "strong step" towards politically isolating the regime.

As a head of state, Ahmadinejad's right to appear at the UN in New York is enshrined in the contract the U.S. signed with the UN in 1947. Section 15 of the U.S. Headquarters Agreement stipulates that the principal representatives of UN members are entitled "to the same privileges and immunities" diplomats have.

However, Washington last week denied visas to some 20 Iranian officials planning to come to New York for the opening of the General Assembly session.

Two government ministers were among those denied visas, the Iranian Fars news agency reported. Some 140 visas were approved for the Iranian delegation. The documents were requested two months ago.

It will be Ahmadinejad's eighth visit to New York as president of Iran. He will step down as president in 10 months, since he is limited to two terms in office. Ahmadinejad also is currently the head of the 120-state Non-Aligned Movement.

Soldier killed while caring for African immigrants

Netanel Yahalomi, 20, was killed in the attack. He was shot in the head when the terrorists opened fire at his artillery force, which was securing work on the border fence in the Har Harif area, while also looking after a group of African migrants that had been stopped at the fence.

A second soldier, who was wounded in the stomach during the incident, was in stable condition at Soroka Medical Center in Be'er Sheva on Sunday.

Ansar Jerusalem, a shadowy group inspired by Al Qaeda, claimed responsibility for the attack, and linked it to the video denigrating the Prophet Mohammad that has sparked protests across the Muslim world.

On Saturday, an Egyptian presidential adviser announced that he will submit a proposal for amending the 1979 Egypt-Israel Peace Treaty soon.

Mohammed Esmat Seif al-Dawla said the proposal will include major changes to the peace treaty's fourth article, which governs the establishment of "limited force zones in Egyptian and Israeli territory" along the shared border with the Sinai Peninsula. According to the Camp David accords, Egypt may station "no more than one division (mechanized or infantry) of Egyptian armed forces" more than 30 miles from the Suez Canal.

Dawla contends that the article limits Egypt's rights to protect the Sinai Peninsula and must be changed.

Foreign Minister Avigdor Liberman responded to mention of amending the treaty on Sunday, telling Israel Radio that "there is no chance Israel will agree to any kind of change" in the 1979 agreement.

"The Egyptians shouldn't try to delude themselves or delude others and they should not rely on this demand," he added.

IDF chief of the General Staff, Lt.-Gen. Benny Gantz, said Sunday that even when the Israeli-Egyptian border is fully sealed, the threat of infiltrations will continue.

While touring the southern border, Gantz said that despite the "tremendous efforts" made to close the border, it will continue to present a challenge to Israel.

About 200 kilometres of a 240-kilometre stretch of fencing has been constructed in an accelerated project. The remaining 40 or so kilometres – in the Har Harif area where Yahalomi was killed, and in a stretch near Eilat – is set to be completed by the end of the year or early 2013, the Knesset's foreign affairs and defence committee was told recently.

Gantz, in a meeting with soldiers and officers from Yahalomi's unit, said, "We are combat soldiers who protect the borders. Clashes take place, and anybody who chooses to serve in a combat unit knows that such things can happen.

"Netanel did his duty to its fullest. He initiated contact with the enemy, fought bravely and died. Any one of you could have been in his place. I am sure that if he was here, he would say that we have to carry on with the mission."

In a statement posted on militant forums late Saturday, Ansar Jerusalem said that the gunmen were Egyptian, and that the operation was a "disciplinary attack against those who insulted the beloved Prophet."

A preliminary IDF probe revealed that the gunmen exploited the presence of the group of African asylum-seekers – to whom several of the Israeli soldiers were offering basic humanitarian assistance – in order to approach the border.

The IDF has since ordered soldiers to exercise extra caution along the border.

Olmert gets probation, fine for breach of trust

JTA

JERUSALEM—Former Israeli prime minister Ehud Olmert was sentenced to one to three years of probation and fined about $19,000 for a breach of trust conviction.

Olmert was sentenced Monday in Jerusalem District Court. He could have faced up to three years in jail. The state had recommended a six-month jail sentence.

The sentence in the Investment Center Affair does not include a ruling of moral turpitude, which would have prevented the 67-year-old from entering politics for seven years.

Olmert had agreed to forgo the perks awarded to a former head of state, including a secretary, an office and a car, in exchange for the finding.

The Jerusalem District Court in July acquitted Olmert on charges of fraud, breach of trust, tax evasion and falsifying corporate records in what became known as the Talsky and Rishon Tours affairs. He was found guilty on the lesser charge of breach of trust in the Investment Center case.

Olmert is the first former Israeli prime minister ever to stand trial. He officially resigned as prime minister in September 2008 after police investigators recommended that he be indicted.

Following the verdicts, Olmert said he has no plans to re-enter politics.

Mossad knew of Yom Kippur attack in advance

Mitch Ginsburg
The Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — The Israeli Mossad intelligence agency knew a full week in advance that Egypt was planning to launch a surprise attack on Yom Kippur 1973.

But the Mossad did not pass the information on in an orderly and explicit way to prime minister Golda Meir's office, according to formerly classified information released last week. The findings come from the commission established in 1973 to investigate the war.

The warning indicated that Egypt was going to attack under the cover of a military drill.

The Mossad's information, received from a senior agent Ashraf Marwan, Egyptian president Gamal Abdel Nasser's son-in-law, was never handed over to the Prime Minister's Office, according to Brig.-Gen. Yisrael Lior, the prime minister's military attaché.

Lior is quoted in the newly declassified material as saying that had he known of the Mossad's information he would have "flown" to the office of deputy prime minister Yigal Allon — who was filling in for an absent Meir at the time — and alerted him.

On Oct. 5 at 12:30 a.m., a cable marked urgent arrived at Mossad headquarters in Tel Aviv. In it, Marwan conveyed that war was imminent and asked for a London meeting with Mossad head Zvi Zamir.

A night clerk read the document to Alfred Eini, Zamir's aide, who told the commission that he felt the cable was urgent enough to warrant waking Zamir. According to the newly released material, Yitzhak Nibenzah, state comptroller and member of the commission, asked Eini whether the information regarded "a warning about the outbreak of war or whether the subject was war."

Eini said that "it was understood that this was a warning about the outbreak of war."

Eini called Zamir, who seemed groggy and unfocused. In the protocols, Eini described the conversation: "He [Zamir] listened. Said, 'Thank you,' and then said, 'OK, I'll go see [Marwan] tomorrow morning.'"

Prime Minister Golda Meir briefs the press during the Yom Kippur War.

The five-member Agranat Commission, chaired by American-born chief justice of the Supreme Court, Shimon Agranat, was appointed by the government to examine the failures leading up to and during the early stages of the war. The new papers, kept under wraps for decades, were released just ahead of the 39th anniversary of the war.

The commission's public findings, released in the spring of 1974, called for the resignations of four senior officers, including the commander of military intelligence, Maj.-Gen. Eli Zeira, and Lt.-Gen. David Elazar, who was found to "bear direct responsibility" for the army's dismal state of readiness on the eve of the war. Meir was cleared of responsibility but ousted from office by public sentiment. She resigned her position some nine days after the publication of the report.

Foreign Minister Abba Eban witnessed the radical change in the assessment of war during the space of several hours, according to the formerly classified information.

He told the commission that on Friday at 5:30 p.m., less than an hour before the holiday's onset, he received a cable stating that there was a chance of a co-ordinated Syrian and Egyptian attack but that the probability of this was low.

Several hours later, he told the commission, he received the following: "According to authentic intelligence sources, the Egyptians and the Syrians will launch a co-ordinated attack toward evening. The goal: conquering the Golan, crossing the canal and establishing [themselves] on the western side."

Eban said: "I would like to note that the mental change between the two cables was sharp, with no shift, which is to say, I had no experiences between the two cables."

The war, which lasted from Oct. 6 to 25, 1973, cost 2,688 Israeli lives and deeply damaged the view of Israel as an indestructible force following the Six Day War.

The two-front attack by Syria and Egypt came as an almost complete surprise on the holiest day of the Jewish calendar.

Also, according to the newly released documents, GOC Northern Command Maj.-Gen. Yitzhak Hafi, later the head of Mossad, received word on Oct. 2 from his chief intelligence officer that the Syrian army was planning an attack, four days before the outbreak of war.

He told the commission that he checked the intelligence information with the relevant authorities in military intelligence and was told that the information was baseless.

He told the commission he had no idea where the information had come from but that he assumed it had come from within military intelligence and had been leaked behind the back of the commander, Zeira, who infamously believed that the chance of war was "low."

Zeira took the brunt of the blame for dropping the ball about the warnings. He was later also investigated for outing Marwan, who died mysteriously in London in 2007.

Last July, the State Attorney's Office dropped the case against Zeira, now 84, citing his age and the passage of time.

Grenade injures shopper in Paris

ITA

PARIS — An explosion at a kosher grocery shop near Paris, reportedly caused by a grenade, damaged the store and injured a shopper, French police said.

Police have not linked the Sept. 19 attack to the release of caricatures hours earlier by a Paris weekly depicting the Muslim prophet Muhammad, including one featuring a haredi Orthodox Jew and a religious Muslim.

The store in the Paris suburb of Sarcelles was reportedly full of shoppers after the Rosh Hashanah holiday beginning their preparations for the pre-Yom Kippur meal, Moshe Cohen-Sabban, president of the Jewish communities of Val d'Oise, told the French online edition of the newspaper Metro.

Richard Prasquier, president of CRIF, the umbrella group representing French Jewish communities, told the television channel i>TELE that two men dressed in black had tossed an explosive device into the shop without saying anything.

"I have no reason to doubt the anti-semitic character of this action," Prasquier said.

According to Metro, the injured shopper sustained contusions in both arms. The newspaper quoted Marc Djeballi, a member of the Sarcelles Jewish community, as saying the device was "a grenade, not a firecracker."

Sarcelles, which is known as "Little Jerusalem," is home to a large Jewish community that emigrated from North Africa in the 1960s.

EU to certify drugs

A committee of the European Parliament has endorsed measures to simplify the sale of Israeli pharmaceuticals within the European Union. "EU-certified pharmaceuticals could be exported to Israel and vice-versa without requiring additional certification in the importing country under a mutual recognition deal endorsed by the International Trade Committee," the committee said in a Sept. 18 statement. To take effect, the move must be approved by the European Parliament next month. Fifteen of the committee's members voted in favour and 13 voted against the measure, which is part of the EU's Agreement on Conformity Assessment and Acceptance with Israel.

Cancel Oslo: Abbas

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas reportedly proposed cancelling the Oslo accords with Israel. Abbas made the proposal at a meeting of Palestinian leadership, the French news agency AFP reported, citing a senior member of the Palestine Liberation Organization. A decision on the issue was postponed until after Abbas returns from the United Nations General Assembly at the end of the month, AFP reported. While at the General Assembly, Abbas reportedly will push to have "Palestine" recognized by the group as a non-member state. The Oslo accords established the Palestinian Authority as the interim government of the Palestinians, and was scheduled to last for five years, when final-status talks were slated to be completed. Final-status issues include Jerusalem, Palestinian refugees, West Bank settlements, security and borders.

Israel invites inspection

The head of Israel's nuclear agency invited the International Atomic Energy Agency to inspect its Soreq nuclear research centre. Shaul Chorev, head of the Israel Atomic Energy Commission, during a Sept. 19 speech to the IAEA's General Conference in Vienna said that Israel has formally asked the IAEA to conduct a safety assessment at Soreq, Ynet reported. Chorev said an inspection "will benefit all concerned in Israel, including the general public. It will also manifest the operation of Israel's nuclear centres according to high safety standards which are compatible with IAEA standards," according to Ynet. Soreq is under IAEA inspection. The nuclear reactor at Dimona, which is rumoured to produce nuclear weapons, is closed to the outside. Israel neither confirms nor denies that it possesses nuclear weapons. Chorev said Israel opposes the plan to hold a conference later this year on Middle East nuclear disarmament, calling it "futile," according to Ynet. The conference is reportedly favoured by the Obama administration.

Reject meeting with Iran, Argentine leaders urge

JTA

BUENOS AIRES — Argentine Jewish leaders are strongly urging their country to reject Iran's request for a meeting of their respective foreign ministers at the UN General Assembly next week.

The Argentine Foreign Ministry on Sept. 19 announced that Iran's Ali Akbar Salehi had requested an audience with Argentine's Hector Timerman to discuss the AMIA bombing case.

Argentina has accused Iran government of directing the bombing that the Lebanon-based terror group Hezbollah is accused of carrying out. The 1994 attack on the Jewish community centre killed 85 people and wounded hundreds more. No arrests have been made in the case, but six Iranians — including Gen. Ahmed Vahidi, the country's defence minister — have been on the Interpol most wanted list since 2007 in connection with it.

"The government must demand that Iran collaborates with justice and that all Iranian suspects that have international arrest warrants by Interpol are brought before the Argentine courts," Aldo Donzis, the head of Argentina Jewish umbrella organization DAIA, told JTA.

Likewise, the Simon Wiesenthal Center sent a letter to the Argentine government questioning the proposed meeting.

"No dialogue between Argentina and Iran can be valid until justice is obtained for the victims of the AMIA bombing, and Iran — in violation of the UN Charter — abandons its genocidal nuclear program targeting Israel, a state friendly to Argentina," Shimon Samuels, the Simon Wiesenthal Center's director of international relations, told JTA.

Tehran announced in a July 16 statement that it was willing to hold "constructive dialogue" with Argentina to "shed all possible light" on the case. It offered condolences to the families of those killed while denying responsibility for the blast.

In October 2010, Iran rejected Argentina's proposal to put its accused citizens on trial in a neutral country.

Hungary slams claims conference

JTA

BUDAPEST — The Hungarian government urged the Claims Conference to "refrain from misleading, intentionally misleading and provoking fear."

The announcement, which was published recently on the government's website, is the latest escalation in an exchange that began last month when the Hungarian government froze money transfers to the Claims Conference, citing poor reporting. The Claims Conference — a New York-based body representing world Jewry in talks on compensation for Holocaust-era persecution — denied the allegations and accused Budapest of "depriving" Holocaust survivors through "disgraceful, deceitful tactics."

In the new online statement, the Hungarian government accused Claims Conference executive vice-president Greg Schneider of using "tactics of making misleading, untrue claims that are designed to provoke fear and uncertainty in Holocaust survivors."

Hungary pledged $21 million in 2007 to Hungarian Holocaust survivors to be distributed over five years, in part by the Claims Conference. A new settlement was to be signed this year until Budapest's decision to freeze money transfers.

Budapest also sought the return of $12.6 million that the government said it gave the Claims Conference. The Claims Conference said it only received $8 million for distribution among Hungarian Holocaust survivors living outside that country.

The money was transferred initially from the treasury to the Jewish Heritage of Hungary Public Endowment, known as Mazsok, a committee of government officials and Jewish representatives.

The Hungarian Ministry of Public Administration and Justice said that based on the report submitted by the Claims Conference to date, "it is impossible to identify the individuals eligible for compensation."

The Claims Conference, according to an email sent to JTA, gave Budapest a 400-page report containing the names of all recipients and how much they received.

"Every penny was transferred to a Hungarian survivor. Not even one cent was spent on administration or any other expense," the Claims Conference said.

Researcher seeks cure for mitochondrial diseases

Cara Stern
Special to The CJN

September means back to school for more than just kids. At the Schwartz-Reisman Centre in Vaughan, Ont., adults filled makeshift classrooms to soak in knowledge from the best of Hebrew University.

Topics ranged from politics, medicine, social science and more. Although the lecture series has been held since 2000, this is the first year that the event was held north of Toronto. That means a new audience, said Elan Divon, executive director of Canadian Friends of Hebrew University.

Haya Lorberbom-Galski is a professor at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem who was featured at the series this year. She spoke to a room of about 15 people about her research into mitochondrial diseases.

Her lecture was not a simple topic. She delved into the background of medication, explaining how a researcher may find a cure for metabolic and genetic diseases.

She introduced her presentation, explaining that she would take the audience through the journey of how she is working to develop a cure, and the process that she must follow in the hopes that she will one day reach human trial. This means following a set of steps that includes an idea stage, to testing on cells and then mice, before finally reaching human trial.

"Modern medicine offers no cure for mitochondrial diseases," she said. "Nothing is known."

In her research laboratory, she tries to find some knowledge on these diseases. She studies potential treatments to cure these illnesses, which she said can affect anybody, but tends to be found in certain cultures, such as Ashkenazi Jews.

Despite the tough subject matter, Lorberbom-Galski tried to simplify the terms to make it accessible for the public. For example, she compared mitochondria – which helps to energize a person – to a battery. If a person has damaged mitochondria, it's like they are running on a damaged battery, in that a person is not able to function, or find energy, without it.

Lorberbom-Galski encouraged the audience to pose questions, and many did.

Hebrew University of Jerusalem professor Haya Lorberbom-Galski spoke in Toronto about her research into mitochondrial diseases.

that scientists have been researching cures for these diseases but have so far been unsuccessful. After 10 years and a lot of resources, a researcher can take an idea and turn it into medicine, she said.

"You have to invest something like millions of dollars," she said, and researchers can spend their lives just working to get the grants needed to test the idea.

Speaking to The CJN after the lecture, Lorberbom-Galski said she hopes the audience will not only learn about the many studies coming out of Hebrew University, but that the lectures will also pave the way for potential donations.

"I think it's a way of raising some future money for the research, for the institute, for everything that is so important for us," she said.

And beyond the money, she said she hopes the lecture gave optimism to anybody in the audience who might know somebody with a mitochondrial disease.

"I think it's giving them some hope that new developments are going on, and part of it is being developed in Israel," she said. "There is a hope for some kind of the diseases that are [currently] with no answer."

That being said, the material was clearly directed at someone with a background in science.

A major theme in her presentation was about money. A researcher's success is largely dependent on how much money is allocated to the research. She explained

New $1 million 'brain prize' launched in Israel

Compiled by CJN Staff

Israel Brain Technologies (IBT), a non-profit organization on a mission to advance Israel's neurotechnology industry, announced earlier this month the launch of its $1-million global Breakthrough Research And Innovation in Neurotechnology (BRAIN) Prize.

Inspired by the vision of Israeli President Shimon Peres, IBT aims to establish the country as the epicentre of global brain technology and related research.

The group promotes multi-disciplinary research and development projects in Israel and abroad. IBT's international judging committee will be composed of distinguished leaders in neuroscience, technology and business, and will include two Nobel Prize laureates.

The million-dollar prize will be awarded to an individual or team that discovers a breakthrough in brain technology.

The prize will showcase Israel as an international hub for innovation in brain research and technology, helping position Israel as not only the "startup nation" but also the "brain nation."

Peres predicted that within the next 10 to 15 years, new discoveries in brain technology and research will revolutionize our lives – perhaps giving way to treatments for neurological disorders, including Alzheimer's and Parkinson's diseases, depression, post-traumatic stress disorder or even sports-related brain trauma.

"Discovering the secrets of the human brain will teach us how to create artificial parts of our body. And it will bring a great deal of unbelievable technologies in all domains of life," Peres said.

"Israel has a strong tradition of putting science and technology at the forefront of its economic development. We know what's happening around us without knowing what's happening within us. Brain research is our next big frontier."

Dr. Rafi Gidron, founder and chairman of IBT, said the Brain Prize will bring together the best minds from around the world "to create the next generation of brain-related innovation, from brain-machine interface and brain-inspired computing to urgently needed solutions for brain disease. It's a global brain gain. Our aim is to open minds – quite literally."

IBT executive director Miri Polachek praised Peres for his aim to make Israel a global centre for the advancement of neurotechnology and brain-related treatments.

"We invite others to share this vision, and for innovators around the world to enter the Brain Prize competition, so we can tackle some of the most exciting challenges facing our planet," Polachek said.

The prize will be awarded at IBT's Global Brain Technology Conference in 2013 in Israel. Interested contestants can visit www.IsraelBrain.org to receive more information and to apply online.

Israeli hesitated to direct film set in Mideast

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Eran Riklis, one of Israel's most successful filmmakers, was less than enthusiastic when he was offered a job to direct a feature film set in the Middle East.

Fred Ritzenberg, an American producer, wanted him to do Zaytoun, which premiered at the Toronto International Film Festival and was runner-up for the Black-Berry People's Choice Award.

Zaytoun, which unfolds on the eve of Israel's 1982 invasion of Lebanon, focuses on an extremely unlikely friendship between a downed Israeli pilot and a boy whose ancestors once lived in Palestine.

"I was exhausted by the Middle East," said Riklis, who dealt with the region in three previous films, Cup Final (1992), The Syrian Bride (2004) and Lemon Tree (2008). "And besides, I was really busy," he added. "I was about to direct The Human Resources Manager."

As well, Riklis felt that the script, written by Palestinian American Nader Rizq, was too dogmatic in its current form.

Ritzenberg, however, wanted to recruit Riklis, having completely fallen in love with his movies.

In Cup Final, PLO fighters in Lebanon capture an Israeli reservist, discovering they all share a passion for soccer. In The Eran Riklis was not so keen to direct another film in the Middle East.

Syrian Bride, a Druze wedding on the Golan Heights collides with the Arab-Israeli conflict. And in Lemon Tree, a Palestinian widow in the West Bank who tries to stop Israel's defence minister from uprooting her lemon trees forms a relationship with his wife.

What appealed to Ritzenberg in this trilogy of films was Riklis' ability to be empathetic and sensitive to both Israelis and Arabs. "I felt that his approach to telling Middle Eastern stories would bring an authenticity to Zaytoun, and would also be fair and balanced."

As Ritzenberg talked about his vision of the film, Riklis' interest mounted. "It was getting exciting," Riklis recalled. "I said, 'Let's move forward.'"

Once Riklis was fully aboard, he reviewed Rizq's script. "It was beyond one-sided," he said in an interview during the festival.

Over a nine-month period, Riklis revised the script eight times, infusing the characters with life and bringing a sense of equilibrium to the situation in which they found themselves.

Riklis claims that Rizq was satisfied with the changes he made. "He's an engineer, not a professional writer, and he understood that script writing is a process."

Originally, Riklis hoped an Israeli actor would play the part of Yoni, the pilot who ejects from his fighter jet over a Palestinian refugee camp near Beirut.

Some of the actors who were approached were simply not interested in playing an Israeli, Riklis disclosed.

In the end, they chose American actor Stephen Dorff, who is known for roles in popular movies such as Blade and Public Enemies.

"We needed an international name actor who could pass for an Israeli. After two hours of talking to Dorff, I knew he was Yoni," Riklis said. "He was very eager to do it."

Dorff, who is half-Jewish, arrived in Israel several months before the shoot to study with a Hebrew dialect coach.

He also visited Israeli Air Force bases and met a pilot who had been shot down in 1982 and endured two years of captivity in a Syrian prison.

"I'm extremely happy with his performance," said Riklis. "He's a serious actor with serious ambitions."

Fahed, the 12-year-old Palestinian boy who helps Yoni escape to Israel, was portrayed by the Israeli Arab actor Abdallah El Akal, who had small roles in 20 films before coming to Riklis' attention.

"He comes from a big family near Tel Aviv's old central bus station," said Riklis. "He's intelligent and clever, but had to be trained to fit into his role."

Produced on a budget of about $7.5 million – peanuts by Hollywood standards – Zaytoun was filmed in Haifa, Ramla, the Galilee and a number of Israeli Arab towns rather than in Lebanon.

"It was a tough eight-week shoot," said Riklis, 58, who was born in Jerusalem and raised in Montreal and New York City before returning to Israel with his family. "We moved around a lot. It was really a road movie."

Riklis – a supporter of a two-state solution to resolve the Arab-Israeli dispute – hopes that Zaytoun will give viewers a better understanding of Israelis and Palestinians.

He rules out the possibility that Zaytoun will be screened in the Arab world. The Syrian Bride was shown at the Marrakesh Film Festival in Morocco, but otherwise, only pirated DVDs of his films have made it to Arab cities.

Currently, Riklis is preparing to direct his next film, Dancing Arabs, which deals with the dual identity of Israeli Arabs. He also plans to direct a thriller in Europe.

To the best of his knowledge, Zaytoun should reach theatres in Canada and the United States in 2013.

One-man play about Simon Wiesenthal

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJA

Playwright and actor Tom Dugan, the son of a decorated World War II veteran who liberated the Langenstein concentration camp in Germany, stars in his own one-man show about Simon Wiesenthal.

The show, Nazi Hunter: The Simon Wiesenthal Story, is playing at the Toronto Centre for the Arts starting Oct. 9.

Dugan says he's always had a fascination with that period in history. When he was a child, he asked his father if he hated Germans and his dad replied that he judges people by the way they behave, not by what group they belong to.

"That rejection of collective guilt was something that I really pondered for years," Dugan says. "Later on, after Wiesenthal passed away in 2005 and I started reading about him, I learned about his lifelong rejection of collective guilt. It really sucked me into his story, and I began to answer that question for myself that had been raised so many years before with my father."

"As... my life turned out, although I'm not Jewish, I married a Jewish girl and I now have two beautiful Jewish boys, so I feel I come to writing this story and portraying Wiesenthal honestly," says Dugan, who lives with his wife, Amy, and their sons, Eli, 11, and Miles, 9, in Woodland, Calif.

Dugan says so much value has come out of Wiesenthal's work tracking down criminals, but he feels his strongest legacy is as a teacher.

"Over 50 or 60 years, interacting with the media, Wiesenthal became very savvy on how to present the Holocaust in a way that drew the young people in and got them interested and passionate about it, rather than be repulsed by the story. I try to capture that the best I can, and thankfully the thousands of people who have seen the show seem to think that I have done that."

Dugan says he always does talkbacks with the audience after each show. "My favourite comment came from a teenager. I really think teenagers pay attention to this story because it may be an introduction to the whole place in history that they may not know much about or have avoided."

"One kid got up and said, 'Wow, I thought this was going to suck.' It sounds like a flip-pant thing to say but it is not... If you can say a piece of theatre is important, then I would say it is a very important exchange when a teenager really is touched by this story."

The 51-year-old Catholic actor from New Jersey has to go through quite a transformation to play an octogenarian Austrian-

Tom Dugan
as Simon Wiesenthal

Hungarian Jewish Holocaust survivor.

"I have a full head of hair and I'm pretty slim, so I had a padded suit made for underneath my costume that adds 50 pounds to my frame. I shave the top of my head to recreate Wiesenthal's look. It takes me about an hour to apply the old-age makeup on my face and my hands," Dugan says.

"I went to a dialect coach to study the Austro-Hungarian dialect, and I've worked with the director Jenny Sullivan, the daughter of famous movie actor Barry Sullivan, to perfect the Wiesenthal's character and walk."

Brothers perform classical improv concert

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJA

Award-winning pianist Sageev Oore and his brother, saxophonist Dani, are bringing their unique blending of classical, jazz, klezmer and improvisation to Toronto.

They perform a free concert at the Richard Bradshaw Amphitheatre at the Four Seasons Centre for the Performing Arts at noon on Oct. 2.

Israeli-born Sageev, an adjunct professor of computer science at Dalhousie University, and Canadian-born Dani, who is pursuing a master's in music at the University of Toronto, have taken composers such as Brahms, Ives, Schubert, Bartok, Schumann, Puccini and Berg, and reconstructed them into a single coherent song cycle for piano and soprano saxophone. They have recorded the work on Radical Cycle, their first CD as a duo.

"I have a classical background originally," says Sageev. "Dani had this stack of books of classical art songs, Schubert, Schumann and others, and we just started reading through them and playing the songs. After playing over time, certain songs started standing out. We were drawn back to these songs."

Sageev said classical music used to have a strong tradition of improvisation, mentioning Chopin, Beethoven and Liszt as incredible improvisers.

"We didn't plan to make a CD of this sort. We love the music, and we have a tremendous love of these pieces and the way they were written. And at the same time we might notice that there is a klezmer feeling or a jazz chord on there that makes sense within the song, so there was a little jump off the cliff in starting to deviate from the notes that are written in classical music."

He said the songs tended to flow into one another. "One piece by Schumann went into a natural transition by Schubert and then back to the one by Schumann."

When Dugan brought the show to Toronto for one performance last year for the Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies, he delighted in learning the history of Toronto's strong Jewish community.

Dugan received the 2011 Los Angeles Drama Critics Circle Award for Best Solo Performance and garnered three 2011 Los Angeles Ovation Award nominations for the play, which premiered in California in 2009.

Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company's Nazi Hunter: The Simon Wiesenthal Story runs Oct. 9 to 18 at the Studio Theatre of the Toronto Centre for the Arts. For tickets, call 1-855-985-2787 or visit www.hgewishtheatre.com.

Oore says that the original pieces were beautiful in themselves, and the duo didn't just improvise over the chords. "We pretty carefully structured improvisations that felt consistent with the essence of the piece. I think it holds together on a composition level, but I don't think one needs to listen for that to enjoy it. If one wants to, then it's there. If [the audience] knows the pieces, it might uncover something like the juxtapositions of two pieces, and I hope that they enjoy hearing these pieces in a new way of some sort."

The brothers have played a lot of klezmer and Yiddish music and say this music is in their music vocabulary. Sageev said his Polish grandmother used to sing to them. When there is a moment during their performance that goes into a klezmer type of sound, he says it is not forced but is the musical words that make sense to them at that time in the piece.

They hope to take this concert on tour next summer. For more information on Dani and Sageev Oore, visit www.oore.ca.

The concert at the Four Seasons Centre is part of a series presented by the Canadian Opera Company. Doors open 30 minutes before the performance, and tickets are distributed at the door on a first-come basis.

Martian Chronicles and Mr. Sammler's Planet

The NASA rover Curiosity set down on Mars this past August on a site dubbed Bradbury Landing, after the American science fiction writer and fantasist Ray Bradbury who died this summer. Bradbury's early stories were among the first and best imaginings of what sort of life humans might make for themselves on Mars. Published in the second half of the 1940s and early 50s they appeared in lowbrow venues like Thrilling Wonder Stories and Weird Tales.

When the stovisitors that his planet is known as Tyrr. This sort of reversal happens again and again, until the earth travelers "seemed to be emptied of all their blood and their rocket fever. They were drained dry."

Although the best science fiction writers seem capable of prophesying the future, they don't necessarily mean to wholeheartedly celebrate what they foresee. But Bradbury understood how his readers felt – especially young male readers picking up the pulps at the pharmacy or the gas station. In another short piece he pictures a boy who "wanted to go to Mars on the rocket. He went down to the rocket field in the early morning and yelled in through the wire fence at the men in uniform that he wanted to go to Mars."

A literary descendant of Bradbury's, the Vancouver-based writer William Gibson wrote recently of his 1950s American childhood as a "zeitgeist... chewy with space-flavoured nuggets" like the "interplanetary themed chrome trim" on his father's Oldsmobile and the molded "spacemen on the counter at Woolworths."

Toward the end of The Martian Chronicles, Bradbury depicts a father explaining to his young son that "science ran too far ahead of us too quickly, and the people got lost in the mechanical wilderness, like children making over pretty things, gadgets, helicopters, rockets..."

When Bradbury wrote of interplanetary rockets and Mars landings, they were a part of a dreamscape. But the space race transformed reality in the middle sixties, and by the late sixties, in his masterful novel Mr. Sammler's Planet, Saul Bellow was responding to immediate events – the Apollo expeditions that circled the moon, which led to the moon landing in the summer of 1969. Bellow's hero, Artur Sammler, is a Polish-born Jew – an old-world intellectual and survivor of a Holocaust-era mass grave. On Mr.

Sammler's planet the two pressing concerns are daily existence in New York City and the German atrocities in wartime Poland. But the moon landing hovers in the background as Sammler confronts popular ideas regarding "the advantage of getting away from here, building plastic igloos in the vacuum, dwelling in quiet colonies."

Pessimism reigns on almost every front in Mr. Sammler's Planet, and Sammler's consideration of the "moon image" leads him to a dark conclusion: "we know now, from photographs the astronauts took, the beauty of the earth, its white and its blue... But wasn't everything being done to make it intolerable to abide here, an unconscious collaboration of all souls spreading madness and poison? To flush us out?... Defile, and then flee to the bliss of oblivion. Or bolt to other worlds."

Here Bellow's conclusion echoes the early musings of Bradbury on Mars travel, and the once-ambivalent feelings about the relationship between real life on earth and a dreamed-of life on far-off planets. Bellow's Artur Sammler – a stand-in for his author – characterizes himself as a man who stands apart "from all developments. From a sense of deference, from age, from good manners... New worlds? Fresh beginnings? Not such a simple matter."

One hears in Sammler the tone of the moralist that Fadiman found in Bradbury's early works, which were not, in fact, those of conventional science fiction. Calling the rover's starting point on Mars Bradbury Landing isn't a great deal more appropriate than calling it Bellow Landing.

Norman Ravvin's recent publications include a novel, The Joyful Child (Gaspereau Press), and Failure's Opposite: Listening to A.M. Klein (McGill-Queen's), which he co-edited with Sherry Simon.

ries were collected under the title The Martian Chronicles. Bradbury's publisher included a preface by the TV figure Clifton Fadiman. Fadiman recognized that Bradbury was – in his early prophetic work – less than wholly enthusiastic about the notion of colonizing Mars. Fadiman called Bradbury a "moralist" who meant to tell us that "the place for space travel is in a book, that human beings are still mental and moral children who cannot be trusted with the terrifying toys they have by some tragic accident invented."

The Martian Chronicles opens with a powerful vignette called "Rocket Summer," in which the Ohio winter is transformed in a matter of moments by a rocket that "lay on the launching field, blowing pink clouds of fire and oven heat." In a story called "Earth Men," the leader of a landing expedition from earth knocks on the first Martian door he sees. Upon being informed that earthlings call the planet Mars, the local haughtily informs his

Israelis win medals at London Paralympic Games

Compiled by CJN Staff

LONDON — Entering the wheelchair tennis competition at the 2012 London Paralympics, Israeli Noam Gershoni was a medal hopeful.

The former Apache helicopter pilot did not disappoint — he defeated American David Wagner in the finals 6-3, 6-1 to earn a gold medal.

Meanwhile, Koby Leon won a silver medal in men's individual H1 time trial, a road cycling event.

Both men were wounded while serving in the Israel Defence Forces (IDF) and were rehabilitated in Beit Halochem facilities, which provides support to disabled veterans.

During the Second Lebanon War, Gershoni was severely wounded in his spinal cord, as well as both his arms and legs when the helicopter he was flying crashed.

He suffered multiple fractures and was evacuated to Haifa's Rambam Hospital. After three weeks he was transferred to Tel Hashomer's rehabilitation centre near Tel Aviv where he was hospitalized for the next six months. Even after his release, he continued going to rehab on a daily basis for an entire year. Four years later, he still frequents the centre twice a week for physiotherapy sessions.

Gershoni, 28, first tried wheelchair tennis at the Beit Halochem facility in Tel Aviv four years ago. "I began playing wheelchair tennis for the fun of it, but didn't think for one moment I'd make it to such high levels," he said.

Playing in a wheelchair, Gershoni is categorized as a "quad," which includes players with varying degrees of severe disability. His breakthrough came during this past year when he beat 2008 Beijing Paralympics silver medalists Boaz Cramer and Shraga Weinberg, three times. He also won an international tournament held in Israel and made it to the finals in three other tournaments.

"Noam stood out from the very first of his training sessions and it was clear we were dealing with a very talented young man with a quick grasp and understanding of the game and a very high intelligence," said his coach, Nimrod Bichler. "He trains hard three times a week, works out at the fitness hall in addition to his physiotherapy sessions, and improves constantly."

Recently, he experienced his first success abroad in the Czech Republic, when he won the singles and doubles tournaments, partnering with a French player.

He defeated the world No. 1-ranked player last spring, and going into the London Paralympics, he was ranked among the top four players in the world.

Koby Leon was serving with the IDF's "Egoz" Special Operations Unit in southern Lebanon when he was critically wounded in the winter of 1996. An explosive device killed two other soldiers and left him a paraplegic.

Sixteen years later, he's 35 years old, married with two children and is well established in life. As he did during his rehabilitation process, he shut himself off from outside influences to prepare for the London Paralympics in the hand bike competition.

Leon woke up at 4 a.m. every morning to work out for an hour on his treadmill at his home in Kfar Vitkin. From there, he continued to the Wingate Institute for a two- or three-hour training practice on his hand bike, followed by two hours cycling in Wingate's oxygen room.

If he did well at practice, he got a pampering massage from his coach Meir Carmon.

In the afternoon, Leon spent time with his two children, Roti, 6, and Noa, 4, managing their household, alongside his wife, Yafit.

Leon's life changed on Dec. 24, 1996 during a mission in southern Lebanon.

"My spine was hit," he said. "[I am paralyzed] from my upper torso downward, and one of my arms is screwed up, too."

He spent two weeks at Rambam Hospital before being transferred to a rehabilitation centre in Tel Hashomer. When he was released, the doctors told him, "There's nothing that can be done. Sit in a wheelchair, take a pill every morning and come to terms with it."

Accepting reality was the last thing Leon had in mind. He set off to travel around the world, visiting the United States, as well as countries in Africa and South America.

"At first, I travelled with an army buddy from my squad," he remembered. "We got to places where the locals had never even seen a wheelchair before and they wanted to touch me. The amazing thing was that instead of other hikers distancing themselves from us, people just wanted to join us. This wasn't an obvious thing at all, because when we climbed up a volcano someone had to carry me, or crossing a river they had to lift me so I wouldn't drown."

"So both Israelis and foreigners, total strangers, all wanted to be a part of my experience. I didn't really understand them at first, but it really gave me ego a boost," he said.

He recalled one particularly special moment.

"I was at a pub, in the middle of nowhere, in a wheelchair and everyone wanted to be with me because of who I was," he said. "It had nothing to do with the wheelchair or with what I had been through or done."

That led him to realize that people can relate to others from all walks of life based on their attitude.

"There are lots of hardships but so what? Everyone's got his own problems. You need to say, 'This is what there is, let's go with the flow,' instead of saying, 'What am I going to do?'" he said.

However, Leon soon realized the high he experienced during his travels was going to come crashing onto the rocks of reality once he was back home in Israel. He found out that what people were willing to do for him under extreme circumstances was not necessarily happening when he went back to his routine.

"I studied computer sciences," he said, "but when I tried finding a job, I realized it was very difficult. I don't want to say it was because of the wheelchair, but people are reluctant to employ disabled people. I'm sure it's not out of malice, and perhaps I would have done the same in their situation, but the reality is that they don't call you back for interviews, or they say thanks, but no thanks."

When he was 27, he achieved two milestones: he finally found a job with a high-tech company, and he married a physiotherapist who had encouraged him to get involved in sports activity and in hand bikes.

Leon added a third milestone in London.

Israel off to good start in baseball qualifier

JTA

JUPITER, Fla. — Nate Freiman slammed two home runs to power Israel to a 7-3 victory over South Africa in its opener of the World Baseball Classic qualifier.

Freiman, a first baseman for the San Diego Padres' Class AA San Antonio Missions, homered in the first and ninth innings.

Most of the Israeli squad's 28-man roster is comprised of Jewish minor leaguers like Freiman. Former Major Leaguers Shawn Green and Gabe Kapler also are on the squad, as are three Israeli pitchers — Alon Leichman, Shlomo Upezt and Dan Rothem.

Former Major League catcher Brad Ausmus is manager of the Israeli team.

Spain and France also are in Israel's qualifier group. One team will advance to the World Baseball Classic in March.

Chicago White Sox third baseman Kevin Youkilis said he will play for Israel if it advances out of the qualifier round.

KOSHER LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

The rise and fall of Garth Drabinsky

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

He was the mogul who crashed to earth after flying too close to the sun.

That's how Barry Avrich deftly describes his subject in his biopic, Show Stopper: The Theatrical Life of Garth Drabinsky.

Having premiered at the Toronto International Film Festival and currently playing in Toronto theatres, Show Stopper is due to be broadcast on the Movie Network on Oct. 4 at 9 p.m.

It's a fine, informative and modulated film about a flamboyant Canadian film and theatre producer whose reach exceeded his grasp.

Three years ago, he was found guilty of fraud and forgery and given a seven-year prison sentence. Drabinsky filed an appeal, and in 2011, the Ontario Court of Appeal reduced his sentence to five years. Drabinsky's partner, Myron Gottlieb, was slapped with a six-year sentence.

And so ended, at least for now, a meteoric career that catapulted Drabinsky into the stratosphere of show business in Canada, the United States and Britain.

A brash, abrasive and volatile operator, Drabinsky is at the centre of this 96-minute documentary through old interviews and file footage. Secondary players include colleagues and insiders such as Sid Sheinberg, former president of MCA Universal, and Allen Karp, former chair and chief executive officer of the Cineplex Odeon movie chain, which Drabinsky co-founded.

The film, narrated by Albert Schultz, pays ample recognition to Drabinsky's achievements.

Apart from having been a feature film producer in the 1970s and 1980s (The Changeling and Tribute, among others) and a co-founder with Nat Taylor of Cineplex Odeon, Drabinsky established Live Entertainment Corporation of Canada, known as Livent, which at one point mounted a quarter of all stage productions in North America.

But while Avrich explores Drabinsky's rise to stardom, a saga that stretched from Toronto and New York to Los Angeles and London, he also documents his fall.

Once in debt to the tune of $300 million, Drabinsky made bad business decisions and supposedly kept two sets of books, shuffling decimals around in a process of "creative accounting."

Drabinsky, who boasted of being "the impresario of my destiny," believed his own "bullshit" and was utterly surprised when he was accused of engaging in criminal activities.

Calling him a "showman extraordinaire" and a "powerhouse," Avrich says he was loved by the performers he em-

Garth Drabinsky in his heyday played but reviled by the investors he defrauded.

The son of middle-class Torontonians Phil and Ethel Drabinsky, he was born in 1949. Contracting polio as a child, he suffered greatly, and as a result of his ailment, he was driven to prove his self-worth.

Highly ambitious, he produced his first play at 16, studied law at university, published a movie magazine, wrote a definitive book on entertainment law and made a film, The Silent Partner, all before he was 30.

Anything but shy, he cold called Taylor, a movie exhibitor in Canada, and the pair launched an empire of multiplex movie theatres across Canada.

"He wanted to be a major player," says Sheinberg.

Drabinsky climbed the greasy ladder of success, but alienated some very important people, including the legendary chair of MCA Universal, Lew Wasserman.

Having been ousted by MCA from his position in Cineplex, Drabinsky founded Livent, which purchased the rights to what would be the phenomenally successful play, Phantom of the Opera.

He transformed Toronto into a theatrical hub, but Livent's dicey balance sheets aroused suspicion. Drabinsky's reputation also took a drubbing because he apparently treated employees terribly. But the artists who appeared in his plays extolled his qualities as an entrepreneur who interested himself in every little detail of a production.

Show Stopper is Avrich's third film about the world of entertainment, having been preceded by The Last Mogul: The Lew Wasserman Story and Unauthorized: The Harvey Weinstein Project. To Avrich's credit, all three documentaries are first-rate.

Bindaas: a fusion of Israeli and Indian culture

Rena Godfrey

Special to The CJN

Under the glow of white patio lights, amid a swirl of friendly faces and Indian music playing in the background, more than 300 Jewish and Indian young professionals gathered earlier this month at a Toronto nightclub to experience Bindaas, an event that embraced Indian-Jewish music, food, art and dance.

The word "bindaas" – Hindi slang for "cool" or "it's all good" – best described this spectacular event, organized and sponsored by the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), SizeDoesntMatter.com and Hillel of Greater Toronto, in partnership with 16 other organizations from Toronto's Indian and Jewish communities.

Israeli musician Shye Ben Tzur performed at Toronto's Tryst Nighclub

The Sept. 6 event, held at Tryst Nightclub, catered to all the senses, as guests were treated to savoury Indian-Jewish cuisine, such as vegetarian pakoras, samosas served with spicy mango dip, mini pita falafel sandwiches, and an assortment of colourful Indian sweets, honey cake and halvah.

Henna tattoos were a big hit, and it was worth the wait to have one of Vaishali Shah's beautiful creations.

The excitement continued with a mesmerizing classical Indian dance performance, called Ka-tahk, performed by husband-and-wife team Hemand and Vaishali Panwar of the Panwar Dance Academy.

The highlight of the evening's entertainment was internationally acclaimed Israeli composer, producer and performer Shye Ben Tzur and his four Indian bandmates, the Rajashtan Gypsies.

Ben Tzur, formerly part of the rock band Sword of Damocles, moved to India for more than a decade and learned Qawwali, a form of Sufi devotional music.

With two albums to his credit, Ben Tzur has created his own unique Qawwali music, infused with Hebrew verses, as well as other unique compositions and Hebrew poetry.

The idea for Bindaas arose a few months ago, when Hillel of Greater Toronto's Israel programming director, Shirin Ezekiel-Hayat, whose parents emigrated from India to Israel in the 1960s, had always wanted to do something with Toronto's Jewish Indian community.

When she was approached by the Ashkenaz Festival about possibly having Ben Tzur play at a joint event, Ezekiel-Hayat immediately contacted Dan Hadad, CIJA's assistant director of special projects and founder of SizeDoesn'tMatter.com, a project that promotes Israel using social media.

Hadad was equally excited to help launch an event that would highlight the rich cultures of both India and Israel.

Reflecting on the event and on being an Israeli-Indian Jew, Ezekiel-Hayat said the event was "very exciting."

"The event was a lot of things all coming together – the way I grew up with the Indian culture, my love for Israel and making these connections between my background, my heritage and the future," she said.

"I know that in Canada we can work on building allies with other communities to have a stronger Israel. My dream of communities working together and being able to share each other's culture can be a reality."

Always seeking opportunities to reach out to other communities and showcase Israeli art and music, Hadad saw Bindaas as the perfect way to connect the Toronto Indian and Jewish young professionals, but he also hopes to reach out to non-Jewish communities.

"I think the Jewish community is in a certain bubble, and we think that there's not that much interest from the non-Jewish community out there, but the reality is at the end of the day we are all curious and want to learn about each other's culture," Hadad said.

Sarina Rehal, CIJA's assistant director of community relations, whose family background is Sikh, saw Bindaas as a natural fit between the two-Indians and Jews.

She spoke of both being immigrant groups in Toronto and also noted the warm diplomatic relations that exist between India and Israel, with strong partnerships in the areas of agriculture, technology and tourism.

Rehal knows that investing in events such as Bindaas and creating a positive platform to connect and make new friendships, "often leads to collaboration on more critical issues that may arise later in time."

Rehal was ecstatic about the overwhelming turnout and commented on the exceptional commitment from the sponsorship partners and their young leadership.

"The sponsors have been partners in planning every aspect of this event, and that speaks volumes to the connection between the two communities."

The holiday guests

Commencing in this issue, web columnist Lauren Aginsky joins our print edition under her married name, Lauren Kramer.

Every year on the High Holidays I wonder if there are Jewish students or young couples in my city who are far from home. If I knew who they were, I'd invite them to join my family around our dinner table and hope that I might alleviate the heartache for home I once felt when I stood in their shoes.

See, before our kids were born, my husband and I relished a nomadic way of life that involved packing up and moving to a new city at frequent intervals. His internships made the moves feasible and fed our mutual sense of adventure. We relocated three times in three years, navigating our way across the United States and exploring national parks and different communities along the way. The only time it really hurt was on the High Holidays.

That's when my longing to be with other Jews, celebrating at someone's home, became overwhelming. The prospect of the two of us sitting around our own table for a holiday meal just didn't feel right. I longed for the warmth and company of another Jewish family, since his and mine were too far away.

So I'd pick up the phone, call the closest synagogue and meekly inquire if any shul members cared to extend an invitation to a couple of Jews far from home.

My husband would roll his eyes. "Do we have to do this? Invite ourselves over?" he would complain. He hated the idea of being an unwanted guest at a stranger's table. I imagined how blissful it might be to feel part of someone else's family, if only for a meal. To enjoy the High Holidays vicariously by being surrounded by excited children and parents who put the thought and planning into their holiday meals that I planned to do someday when I had a family of my own.

Of course, it didn't always work out that way. At a Rosh Hashanah dinner in Boston we were acutely aware that we were unwanted guests who'd been accepted at the 11th hour as an act of charity. That night, instead of conversing with others at the table we somehow found ourselves with our hands in the sink, tasked with washing and drying the dishes. Hubby glared at me, a grunt of indignation in his eyes.

Sometimes my requests for a High Holiday invitation just didn't work out. But those were the minority of occasions. In San Antonio, Texas, we were immediately included by a group of expats whose first invitation was followed by many more for Shabbat dinners, breaking of the fast and barbecues.

In their company we found support, made lifelong friends and were adopted as surrogate family members. Those meals deeply influenced our impressions of the city and our readiness to consider staying longer.

Our family numbers six now, and when we invite siblings it quickly swells to a crowd. But amid the noise of preparation, prayer and the meals that follow, my mind's eye looks for the Jewish singles or couples who need the spiritual food of a warm, family meal. I wish I could lay a place at the table for them, because I know exactly how it feels.

The numbers 14447

"For the dead and the living, we must bear witness." — Elie Wiesel

I met a man who wasn't in Auschwitz. In fact, he wasn't alive during the Holocaust, yet on his left inner forearm are the concentration-camp numbers 14447.

These five numbers belonged to Eduard Berkovits, a Jew, and survivor of Auschwitz. Three years after Eduard's death, in 2008, his son, Lou, had them tattooed on his arm. When I tell people what Lou has done, they ask me to repeat what I said. Then they are silent. That's how I responded, too, when Lou first showed me his 14447.

Lou is a local real-estate broker, a father and a husband. His father, of blessed memory, was a Romanian Jew who was in Auschwitz. There he watched over his younger brother. They suffered together. They survived together.

Before the war, Eduard had been Orthodox. After his liberation, however, Eduard married a non-Jewish woman. They moved to Israel. When Lou was 10, they made Canada their home.

Lou told me his father was an extraordinary man. He said he was an entrepreneur, free and independent — the type of soul the SS could not keep down. Upon arriving in Canada, he rented a mechanic bay, made his own tools and put up a sign that said, "I fix anything." The people came. "He had no sense of entitlement," Lou said about his father. "That was amazing to me."

Urban Writer

Avrum Rosensweig

Over the years, Lou watched his father live. He saw a man with a powerful work ethic, someone who lived life with gusto and passion. When Eduard died of a brain tumour, Lou wanted to somehow hold onto his father's energy. "Really, I was looking for something beyond the memory." He wore his father's ring, but it held no significance.

One day, Lou remembered a time when Eduard already had dementia and was unable to recall, in a discussion, much at all about his liberation. He did, however, remember the meaning of the 14447 on his arm. He pointed to the numbers and said, "Laga," to his son, a slang Hungarian word for camps.

Shortly afterward, Lou went to a tattoo artist and had 14447 inked into his body. He chose to be branded. "When I looked at the numbers, I saw my father's face. It gave me strength to do the right things. The numbers affected me so much. They were just so much part of him," Lou said.

"The tattoo was against his [Eduard's] will. But he fought beyond it. 14447 represents the experiences which he encountered at a very young age — the fear, loneliness, helplessness, misery, and I'm sure every other horrible emotional and psychological trauma that he faced.

"But 14447 also represents my father's character, his strengths and smarts, but mostly his unwavering determination to become a survivor. They are the things that made him the most unique person in the world to me," Lou continued.

"He was branded and he was my father. For that he deserves my ultimate respect, and commitment to never forget his life."

Lou said he has never regretted getting the tattoo. He's doesn't know anyone else who did the same. He added, "Those numbers represent everything that is right and wrong with people in our world."

"On my left forearm I bear the Auschwitz number; it reads more briefly than the Pentateuch or the Talmud and yet provides more thorough information." — Jean Améry in At the Mind's Limits.

BROWNE ONION KUGELS

Yield: 12 side-dish servings

- 1 ½ c medium egg noodles
- 1 stick unsalted butter
- 2 lg. onions, chopped
- 1 1/4 c sour cream

Prime Minister Stephen Harper, left, and Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu meet in New York on Sept. 28.

Leaders discuss the Middle East

Netanyahu heaps praise on Canada

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Prime Minister Stephen Harper met with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu in New York last Friday to discuss the threat of Iran.

Netanyahu — fresh from his Sept. 27 address to the United Nations General Assembly, where he urged the international community to set clear “red lines” regarding Iran’s nuclear program — heaped praise on Harper during a photo session.

“Stephen, I think that what you did, severing ties with Iran, was not only an act of statesmanship, but an act of moral clarity,” Netanyahu said, referring to Canada’s shuttering of its embassy in Tehran and the expulsion of all Iranian embassy staff in Ottawa last month.

Harper said he was “delighted” to see Netanyahu again. The two last met when the Israeli leader visited Ottawa this past March.

During their one-hour meeting at New York’s Loews Hotel, the two leaders spoke about Middle East issues, including the peace process and the need to counter the regional and global security threat posed by Iran. Harper repeated his desire to see a peaceful resolution to the situation in Iran, his office said in a statement.

The two leaders also discussed energy issues and the economy, in particular the importance of modernizing the Canada-Israel free trade agreement, Harper’s office said.

The leaders met the morning after Harper told a private audience gathered in his honour that the international community needs to increase pressure on Iran and that Canada under his watch will, “when confronted with evil in the world, take strong, principled positions in our dealings, whether popular or not.”

Harper was in town to receive the New York-based Appeal of Conscience Foundation’s “World Statesman of the Year Award” on Sept. 27. The non-profit’s founder, Rabbi Arthur Schneier, a Holocaust survivor, called the prime minister a man who “cares for all humanity.”

Truck Kills Woman

MONTREAL — A 43-year-old woman died at Baron de Hirsch Cemetery Sept. 24 after being hit by a truck. Lise Shouker entered the cemetery just after 4 p.m. as a maintenance vehicle was backing out. Baron de Hirsch executive director Jay Aaron said. She died instantly. It's believed she was coming from a workshop for people with intellectual disabilities across the street, where she was a former client, he said. Her mother and sister were apparently following behind her. They were going to visit the father's grave. The driver so far has not been found at fault. "The driver had activated the beeper and lights. It was daylight, there was no sun in the face... it's just a horribly tragic accident," Aaron said.

App Omits J-lem

NEW YORK — The map included in Apple's new iOS6 operating system doesn't show Jerusalem as the capital of Israel. Every other country on the map has its capital listed, the Algemeiner reported last week. In addition, the iOS6's world clock lists Jerusalem without a country — the only city listed that way, the paper said. Apple didn't respond to JTA requests for comment.

Iran Snubs Oscars

TEHRAN — Iran won't submit a movie for the 2013 Oscars in protest of an anti-Muslim video. Iran's culture minister said Sept. 25 his country will boycott Academy Awards in April because the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences failed to protest the film, which mocks the Prophet Muhammad. The academy organizes the event. Deadline for submissions was Oct. 1. Iran had planned to submit A Cube of Sugar, a comedy about a wedding that turns into a funeral. Iran won the 2012 Oscar for best foreign language film

Minister Tables Circumcision Proposal

BERLIN — Germany's Justice Ministry proposed to amend a law on male circumcision to safeguard the rights of Jews and Muslims to perform the ritual.

The change, which aims to cement religious rights while responding to critics of the practice, would allow ritual circumcision on boys with parental consent and performed by a medical practitioner with the strongest degree of anesthetic medically allowable given the child's age.

Jews circumcise infant boys on their eighth day, while Muslims often do so on older children.

Justice Minister Sabine Leutheusser-Schnarrenberger composed the text. If approved by parliament, a paragraph would be added to the law code on the rights of children. Under the amendment, circumcision of boys would reportedly remain a commission of "bodily injury" but wouldn't be punishable if parents follow the law's requirements.

The Central Council of Jews in Germany hasn't responded to the proposal, but the deputy head of the Association of Turks in Germany greeted it positively.

The proposal follows months of debate sparked by a controversial ruling last May by Cologne District Court that criminalized non-medical circumcisions of minors. In a rare show of solidarity, Jewish and Muslim groups have criticized what both see as an attempt to curtail religious freedom.

for A Separation. Among the entries it beat was Israel's Footnote by Joseph Cedar. The Israeli Academy of Film and Television chose Fill the Void as film of the year at Israel's national film awards, making it the Israeli nomination for the Oscar. It's about a young haredi woman from Tel Aviv who is engaged to be married, but must decide whether to marry her brother-in-law.

Israeli hospital strengthens ties with Canada

Meir Medical Center about the size of Toronto's Sunnybrook

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Canadian donations to Israel's Meir Medical Center are having a major impact on the hospital and building ties with the Canadian medical establishment.

The Canadian Friends of Meir Medical Center has raised more than $2 million for the centre since 2010. It was established as a charitable foundation in 2006.

In a recent interview, Arie Raif, the foundation's president, told The CJN he's extremely touched by the increasing generosity of Canadian donors.

"It's incredible. And it's not just Jews who give to the hospital. Because [the centre] treats people of all denominations," non-Jews in Canada and across the world see it as a worthwhile cause, he said.

Raif noted that the Meir Medical Center is now about the size of Toronto's renowned Sunnybrook Health Sciences Centre campus and is "receiving a level of recognition" on par with Toronto's Hospital for Sick Children.

"Not that we're in competition with either of those hospitals," he added, praising each as "fantastic institutions."

Meir Medical Center, a teaching hospital in Kfar Saba, just north of Tel Aviv, serves nearly one million people, Arabs and Jews, each year.

It's associated with the Sackler School of Medicine at Tel Aviv University and is known for its advances in the fields of cancer research, diabetes, orthopedic surgery, geriatric care and head and neck surgery.

The hospital is also in the midst of a fundraising campaign to expand its pediatric services by building upon its children's hospital and increasing capacity for its pediatric surgical wards.

Three doctors from the centre were part of a seven-member Israel Defence Forces medical field unit that was first on scene after the 2010 earthquake in Haiti, which devastated most of Port-au-Prince.

They helped the unit perform 319 surgeries and deliver 16 babies during the rescue effort.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's appearance at the UN General Assembly last week was the centrepiece of a crowded schedule of events in which he met with as many editors, journalists, anchor people, reporters and commentators as possible, and dined with as many interested, by invitation-only guests as possible.

His trip to America, in essence, was one huge marketing mission to burnish his image, get the message out and pose for photographers. We, of course, believe that his image is unburnishable. But that misses the point.

The wily president was not interested in changing our minds and influencing our opinions of him. His target audience was in Iran and in the self-styled "non-aligned" states of the Third World and Fourth World, where information flows according to the whims of the rulers and opinions are held by the majority according to those very same whims. To these audiences, Ahmadinejad asserted his mettle and proved his moral strength in the city that is the very avatar of sin and decadence in the sinful, decadent devil's lair - America!

Thus, one of the aspects of the western media's coverage of Ahmadinejad that is most frustrating and teeth-grinding to us is the seemingly cavalier attitude by which leading members of the media corps deal with him: as somewhat of a curio, an oddity to be sure but interesting nevertheless because of his very oddity.

Moreover, it is their responsibility, they insist, to get his story out, too. Some intend to pin him squirming on the glass slide, held down in humiliation and ridicule by his outrageous, ignorant, preposterous statements and outright malevolence.

But they never do.

The infamous interview with Media frustration

broadcaster Larry King some years ago was, perhaps, the best example of the fawning, failed interview. But there was no shortage of such similar failures during Ahmadinejad's recent trip.

The blog called International Campaign for Human Rights in Iran had a very acerbic assessment of Piers Morgan's interview with the Iranian ruler on Sept. 24 on CNN.

From the editor's desk...

The key hope that this group held out for Morgan did not relate to Ahmadinejad's views of Israel. It was rather, for Morgan "to shed some light on the eight years of worsening human rights violations during his time in office." But Morgan failed utterly, according to the monitor group.

"Mr. Morgan seemed surprisingly unprepared and was not only incapable of asking proper followup questions but also got the facts wrong at one point in the interview. This, coupled with Ahmadinejad's skilful manipulation of language, playing his usual game of hypotheticals, off-topic responses, and challenges to the interviewer, led to yet another series of dodged questions, vague answers and shirked responsibilities."

The renowned editor of The New Yorker David Remnick wrote a small essay about meeting the Iranian president along with "a few dozen journalists at the Warwick Hotel" just after 8 a.m. on Sept. 24.

Apart from three very brief asides, he did not offer any editorial comment interpretation, elaboration, or explication of the outrageous substance of Ahmadinejad's statements. Remnick's intention, we must suppose, was simply to let the Iranian president condemn himself out of his own mouth, to let the statements speak for themselves, res ipsa loquitur.

But we do not know Remnick's intention for sure.

The following is the totality of Remnick's personal editorial comments on the more than 700 words of Ahmadinejad quotes.

- At the beginning of the essay: "He [Ahmadinejad] does not much conceal his pleasure in provoking his earnest questioners."

- At the midpoint of the essay: "Ahmadinejad was also intent on doing what he could to further aggravate the troubled relations between President [Barack] Obama and the Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, who has been demanding that the U.S. declare its 'red lines' on the Iranian nuclear issue."

- At the end of the essay: "And what of [writer Salman] Rushdie (the target of a fatwa)? Ahmadinejad smiled ominously."

Clearly, Remnick, the astute observer, thoughtful analyst and superb writer had determined to avoid commentary. He undoubtedly abhors Ahmadinejad's beliefs and his policies. But what is the benefit, what is the intellectual, journalistic or ethical imperative in letting the Iranian leader's patently false, self-serving assertions be published unchallenged, without even so much as an asterisk of explanation?

The net effect of Remnick's column is simply to give Ahmadinejad yet another of the many western platforms from which he has smugly and defiantly propagated his hatred toward the Jewish state and others.

Remnick, like many others, are so preoccupied with observing rules of journalistic form that he has become oblivious - in such rare, special cases of a leader of an extremist, theocratic government preaching genocide - of the possible substantive harm of his work.

Pro-Israel think-tank opens Toronto chapter

Conference to focus on Combatting the Delegitimation of Israel

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

The Canadian Institute for Jewish Research (CIJR), a Montreal-based independent pro-Israel think-tank, held the founding meeting for its Toronto chapter this summer.

Next month, CIJR is organizing an international conference on Combatting the Delegitimation of Israel to be held at Beth Tzedec Congregation.

Sally Zerker, a retired York University economics professor, is co-chairing the chapter with David Freeman. She has been involved with the Montreal group almost since its inception 25 years ago, and is working, on a temporary basis, to get the chapter started.

CIJR founder Fred Krantz, a professor at Concordia University, promoted the idea of setting up in Toronto, Zerker said. "It's a big city, bigger than Montreal, with a larger Jewish community, and [the organization] should have its face here as well as in Montreal. It's long overdue," she added.

For now, CIJR Toronto is working through the organization's Montreal office. "We'd like to have an office [in Toronto]," Zerker said.

A more immediate goal is organizing the Nov. 18 conference, which will include former Israeli ambassador to Canada Alan Baker and Rabbi Abraham Cooper of the Simon Wiesenthal Center, among others.

Ongoing CIJR activities include the production of Dateline: Middle East Journal, a biannual publication; its ISIRANET Daily Briefing and Israzine, a monthly online magazine.

As well, it supports the student-written magazine Dateline: Middle East and administers a year-long Israel advocacy program to help students counter anti-Israeli activity on campus. The Toronto chapter is hoping to start the advocacy program here, too, once universities' first semester is over, Zerker said.

CIJR founder Fred Krantz

Earlier this year, CIJR made its first foray into Toronto with a national conference about Israel's security. That event, attended by 70 people, constituted "testing the waters" and was the springboard for formalizing a Toronto chapter.

CIJR is "meant to counter negative media coverage of Israel," Zerker said. "It's unequivocally pro-Israel. Our interests are to defend the position of Israel in ways that are authentic and academically provable and true."

For further information about the conference on Combatting the Delegitimation of Israel, go to isiranet.org or call 514-486-5544.

Herzl film an instructive biopic

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

The notion that a compelling idea and a committed individual can alter the course of history is not, as some might contend, so far-fetched. Proof of this thesis is found in the career of Theodor Herzl (1860-1904), an assimilated Viennese journalist who once called for the mass conversion of Jews as a means by which to defuse antisemitism and thereby solve the "Jewish problem" in Europe.

But having painfully realized that antisemitism was an endemic and permanent phenomenon that could not be ameliorated, he "converted" to Zionism and paved the way for the creation of Israel, just 51 years after the first Zionist congress took place in Basel, Switzerland, in 1897.

This, in essence, is the theme of It Is No Dream: The Life of Theodor Herzl, a well-crafted and thorough documentary which received its Canadian premiere on Sept. 20 in Toronto under the auspices of Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies.

Produced by Moriah Films, the cinematic arm of the Wiesenthal Center in Los Angeles, directed by Richard Trank and narrated by the British actor Ben Kingsley, It Is No Dream is an instructive biopic about a man whose realization of the depths of European antisemitism led him to become the founder of modern political Zionism and the father of the state of Israel.

Let down, again

The content and tone of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' address to the General Assembly last Thursday was probably a bit of a disappointment, if not also quite a shock, to the group of prominent American Jewish community leaders who met with Abbas in New York Sept. 24, three days ahead of his scheduled appearance before the General Assembly.

"Abbas promises to recognize the Jewish link to Israel in his General Assembly speech," Ha'aretz reported on Sept. 25.

"Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas told Jewish leaders that his UN speech would address showing greater sensitivity to Jewish claims to Israel," JTA reported after the meeting.

True to form, but not however to his word, this is how Abbas began the substantive part of his speech last week: "Developments over the past year have confirmed what we have persistently drawn attention to and warned of: the catastrophic danger of the racist Israeli settlement of our country, Palestine." "Racist" established the tone of the remarks. And the proof of purported Israeli racism and malevolence was the overarching objective of his remarks.

As Haviv Rertig Gur of the Times of Israel noted, "Abbas did not take the UN podium in order to return to negotiations. Rather, he used his speech before the United Nations to offer a condemnation of Israel and Israeli policies that sounded more like a legal brief before the International Criminal Court than a diplomatic address or negotiating position."

"And that's no accident."

"Israel, Abbas said, is an international law-breaker that is 'permitted to evade accountability and punishment' despite 'its violations of international law and covenants.'"

Rertig Gur further pointed out "Abbas described Israel's 'illegal' policies in language taken directly from the texts and discourse of international law."

In other words, Abbas used the General Assembly podium to meticulously present a one-sided, distorted set of "facts" about a negotiating partner with whom he refuses to negotiate as a precursor to a formal complaint against Israel that the PA plans to bring to the International Criminal Court.

As for showing greater sensitivity to Jewish claims to Israel, the only possible reference in his speech that could fall into that category is the following: "We do not seek to delegitimize an existing state - that is Israel, but rather to assert the state that must be realized - that is Palestine" (emphasis added). Even this pathetic 12-word reference was disingenuous and false, since delegitimizing the existing State of Israel was precisely and entirely the very purpose of his speech to the General Assembly. Once again, Abbas has let slip the opportunity to advance his people's cause and the achievement of peace with Israel.

"Let Israel and the Palestinian Authority begin negotiations right away. With goodwill, we can resolve our differences." That is what he should have told the world. But that is what he is unable and unwilling to say. Alas.

Minority can topple a gov't

My response to the book The Myth of the Muslim Tide: Do Immigrants Threaten The West?, reviewed by Joseph Serge, is that the point of whether Muslims will form a majority in the West is irrelevant ("Muslim takeover" is a myth," Sept. 13). What is relevant, however, is that it only takes a minority of fanatics to topple a government and take control. The silent, peaceful majority becomes irrelevant, as it did under the totalitarian regimes of Communist Russia, Communist China and pre-World War II Japan. What happened in Nazi Germany also demonstrates how the peaceful majority's acceptance of a fanatical minority group, the National Socialist Workers' Party, eventually led to its rise in power.

Today the equivalent of Nazi Germany's murderous ideology is spreading globally by a minority of fanatical Muslims. They seek the global imposition of Islamic law and the re-establishment of an Islamic empire. It is this fanatical Muslim minority that slaughters Christians throughout Africa, that bombs, beheads, and kills rape victims and homosexuals, as well as teaching its young to become suicide bombers. It is this minority that staged riots around the world over the video Innocence of Muslims. It is this minority that is assaulting our right to free speech, one of the fundamental rights in a democratic society. History has proven that it is the fanatical minority that determines the future of a nation, and it always begins with the assault on free speech.

Cynthia Yacowar-Sweeney
Laval, Que.

Muslims need tolerance for criticism

The video Innocence of Muslims, depicting the Muslim Prophet Muhammad in the most derogatory terms, is stupid and ill-conceived. Likewise, the outrageous reaction to the film, if that indeed was the catalyst, was equally stupid and totally unnecessary. To some extent, it is understandable reaction by Muslims; who for years lived under governments that only sanctioned movies and articles, were published under the government's authority. With this uninformed background, they could well believe the odious film had the approval of the United States government. Yet the rioting did not stem from the masses, but from reasonably enlightened leaders who would know that in democracies, where freedom of speech is a given, such films are able to see the light of day without government approval. In the end result, religious leaders moved their masses to riot, murder and destroy simply as a way to attack American values.

If ever there is to be peace between Muslims and other religions, the Muslim leaders must instill in their followers a tolerance for criticism, no matter how offensive. Even when there was a cold peace between Israel and Egypt, the Egyptian press printed editorial cartoons showing Jews with long noses biting into babies and sucking their blood. In Iran, a contest was run for the best way to depict Jews in the worst possible light. The winning cartoon showed Orthodox Jews praying at a building identified as Wall Street. Iran's president continuously slanders Jews and the State of Israel, calling the state a cancer that should be eliminated from the face of the Earth. Notwithstanding, Jews did not take to the streets and riot, and following the teachings of their Christian brethren, they turned the other cheek. I do not think it is too much to ask of Muslims and their leaders to do likewise and behave in a civilized manner.

Small group pressured Church

Gerald Steinberg implies that Independent Jewish Voices (IJV) was able to pressure the United Church of Canada to adopt a boycott policy against Israel ("The United Church, Israel-bashing and token Jews," Sept. 6). According to Canadian Dimension magazine issue of last November, IJV has only 250 members. Just like the rabidly anti-Zionist Neturei Karta, who comprise only a few hundred haredi members, both have a knack for attracting media attention. While Britain's Jewish population at 270,000 is one-third smaller than Canada's, its main anti-Zionist Jewish group, Jews for Justice for Palestinians, numbers 1,700, many of them distinguished citizens, seven times as large as its counterpart in Canada, IJV.

A battle for the rabbinate, and for Israel's soul

Matti Friedman
Times of Israel

A battle is brewing for control of Israel's chief rabbinate – an institution that regulates important parts of the lives of Israeli Jews and is generally mocked, hated or ignored.

Jews in Israel cannot get married, divorced or buried without the rabbinate, which also controls conversion, making it the Jewish state's official arbiter of Judaism. While the institution started out as part of the modern religious Zionist movement, in recent decades the national rabbinate and the local rabbinates of Israeli cities and towns have become largely controlled by ultra-Orthodox rabbis and their stricter interpretations of Jewish law. This has put the institution at odds with the mainstream and has caused tension with more liberal Israelis and Jews abroad.

Control of the rabbinate and the two key posts in the institution – those of the Ashkenazi and Sephardi chief rabbis – will be decided in an election slated for the coming spring. Tzohar, an organization of religiously moderate Orthodox rabbis in Israel, hopes to return the institution to Zionist – as opposed to ultra-Orthodox – hands, accusing the rabbinate of alienating Israelis and warning of an impending crisis in Israeli society if problems of Jewish identity are not solved soon. The rabbinate is still necessary, the rabbis of Tzohar insist, but it must be changed.

Tzohar recently launched an ad campaign targeting the rabbinate, and it plans to field a candidate for chief rabbi. The most likely nominee is the group's leader, Rabbi David Stav, a 52-year-old father of nine from the community of Shoham in central Israel. The Times of Israel interviewed Rabbi Stav in Jerusalem last month. The following is an edited version of the conversation.

What's wrong with the religious establishment in Israel?

Let's look at the results of the current situation: There are more than 1.25 million Jews here who moved to Israel and whose Judaism is officially in doubt. One-third of secular couples get married in civil ceremonies outside of Israel.

What is the most pressing problem with the system?

The most urgent problem is that in 10 to 20 years, Israel society will splinter to pieces. It will be a society in which people won't believe that their friends or neighbours are Jewish. This society is one that won't be able to survive. To avoid this, we have to create a common Jewish denominator that is as broad as possible.

What's the cause of the problem?

We don't treat Israeli Jewish society like customers. We treat them as the income tax department does, as people who owe us. People don't need us, we need them. That's the basic point that must change. When a Russian or American Jew comes here, we don't help him prove that he is Jewish – we say, bang your head against the wall and prove it. We tell them it's their problem, not ours. This has to change.

Couples are afraid to get married in Jewish ceremonies, not only because they are concerned about the wedding, but even more so because they fear what will happen when they get divorced. We have to guarantee their right to get married in a respectful fashion and to get divorced in an efficient and respectful fashion. And we must ensure that the conversion problem is solved.

What's the solution?

We need to create motivation among young children to pursue conversion, starting with children in religious schools. Today there are thousands of children of immigrants who are in religious schools but are not being converted because their parents are not Jewish according to Jewish law. They may be prepared for their children to convert but do not want to convert themselves. There are solutions to this problem in the boundaries of Jewish law.

The early Zionist, Rabbi Abraham Isaac Kook, one of the first to envision the institution of the rabbinate, stars in your new campaign against the country's current rabbinic leadership. What is the gap between what Rabbi Kook proposed and what exists today?

Rabbi Kook always saw the entire nation of Israel, not a specific group or party. Unfortunately, some politicians see the rabbinate as an institution they can use to take care of the specific group they represent and don't see the needs of all of the people of Israel.

You're saying that the ultra-Orthodox sector, which does not see things through a national perspective, took over an institution that was supposed to be Zionist.

I'll put it differently. It's not the ultra-Orthodox, but rather political operators who see the rabbinate as a source of power and are not concerned with the broader good of the people of Israel. I am sure there are good people in the ultra-Orthodox sector who care about the needs of the state. But the political operators who have taken over the system see only the small group from which they came.

How did the rabbinate slip from the grasp of Zionist rabbis?

It was the cheapest thing politicians from the right or left could sell in coalition negotiations – in return for something the public does not quite understand or see as important, they got the votes they needed in the government. The rabbinate was the cheapest thing to sell.

What's the solution you suggest?

We want rabbis who care about the state to believe once again that the rabbinate can be returned to the state, and we want them to return to the rabbinate on the local and national level.

We say that if this mess continues for 10 more years, it is doubtful whether the rabbinate will have meaning, because the threads holding Jewish society in Israel together will have completely disappeared

The establishment, right and left, often sees the national religious camp as a threat because of its political views. If there is a peace process, the leadership might understandably prefer to have an ultra-Orthodox religious establishment, which is more flexible on issues like territorial withdrawals.

True. The ultra-Orthodox sector is willing to sit in any government, and it is more convenient to deal with for many politicians than the national religious sector, which is ideological and political.

I grew up in Toronto in a largely religious neighbourhood that was part of a thriving Jewish community. There was no rabbinate. The same goes for anywhere else in the Diaspora. Why does Israel need one?

In Toronto or any other city in Canada or the United States, there is no Jewish state and no struggle of that Jewish society for survival. No one cares if you want to be Reform, Conservative – do whatever you want. But here you need to create an army, a society, a country, and it has to survive. You need to create an elementary common denominator around which the society can unite. That denominator is that we are Jews. Beyond that, there's nothing. As soon as this denominator is broken, there will be a question about how this society can continue to live, because the people of Israel A, who are religious, won't necessarily risk their lives for the people of Israel B, who might not even be Jewish, and vice versa.

Trying to create a religious monopoly called the rabbinate can do more harm to Judaism than good.

There is a price to having a monopoly, this is true. I think Judaism suffers from it. But I think that in the existing circumstances, there is no choice. Right now, the alternative to the existence of the rabbinate is the disintegration of the components of Jewish identity in Israel. The common denominator created by the rabbinate is minimal, it's tiny – don't get confused, no one is trying to create a common denominator that is too deep – but the minimum must be preserved.

But many people already ignore the rabbinate. They don't convert, and they get married however they want. The breakdown you fear already exists.

What you're saying is true. We say that if this mess continues for 10 more years, it is doubtful whether the rabbinate will have meaning, because the threads holding Jewish society in Israel together will have completely disappeared. If today a third of secular couples are getting married outside the rabbinate, in 10 years it will be half, and as soon as it's half, the story is over. This is why the upcoming elections for the rabbinate are crucial.

Do you have any chance of success?

We're not committed to success. We are committed to a 100 per cent effort. God will do what He needs to do.

The Israeli-Palestinian conflict is always a fresh topic

Writing this column can be a challenge, at least if I want to keep it up to date. I've been burned before. In December 2008, I wrote a piece about the need to overhaul Israel's electoral system, knowing that it would be published in early January, weeks before Israel's general elections. Pretty topical, no? So what was I to do when the government decided to embark on Operation Cast Lead in Gaza a few days after my deadline, making my column completely irrelevant in the midst of that military operation.

Thus, I won't devote this piece to the only story presently interesting Israelis of all persuasions: Iran's nuclear arms program and questions relating to it, i.e., if, when and how Israel will attack the Islamic Republic's nuclear facilities. I won't, because by the time this is published, those questions might be moot or, as is par for the course in this neck of the woods, some other drama could be unfolding.

In my search for a topic certain to remain current in the two-plus weeks between writing and publication, one that's been off everybody's radar for the past couple of years, the answer was obvious – that nuisance called the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

True, every once in a while, this conflict rears its ugly head. Here and there, missiles are fired from Gaza by Hamas or Islamic Jihad, or more recently by Bedouins in Sinai affiliated with even more radical Islamic groups. Several Palestinian terrorist attacks are perpetrated yearly against Israelis, mostly by West Bank Palestinians against Israelis living in Judea and Samaria, since these days it's harder for terrorists to get into Israel proper because of the much-maligned, but effective, security barrier. And we also endure Jewish terriffs sufficient to cause further escalation between the two sides.

The world seems content with this situation. The Americans are too busy with their elections and, as it is, both President Barack Obama and his Republican challenger, Mitt Romney, are preoccupied with another Mideast issue, that being Iran. The Europeans are in over their heads with their own woes, mostly financial. And the Arab world is trying to contain the Arab Spring's fallout and to figure out what happens next in places such as Syria, or the next time some idiotic film or cartoon defames the Prophet Muhammad.

Closer to home, both Israeli and Palestinian leaders also seem to have no particular interest in moving closer to a resolution of the conflict. That's certainly true about Ismail Haniya, leader of Hamas in Gaza, who never hides his aspirations to wipe the Zionist entity off the face of the earth. Hamas and other like groups are taking advantage of the lull in action to arm themselves to the teeth with plundered weapons from Libya's erstwhile stockpiles and other dubious sources.

And when someone actually mentions the need to renew dialogue, there's no sense of urgency, and neither Palestinian Authority nor Israeli leaders appear ready for bona fide negotiations, each exhibiting their own brand of intransigence. Security co-operation continues, but there is little trust between Netanyahu and PA President Mahmoud Abbas.

Besides, after several years of apparent prosperity, Abbas and his Prime Minister, Salam Fayyad, are dealing with a mini Arab Spring of their own, with demonstrations taking place in different locales across the West Bank.

Netanyahu, meanwhile, seems content with the status quo. He's ideologically opposed to relinquishing more of the biblical Land of Israel, and his government's policy is to bolster Israeli settlements in Judea and Samaria.

But all that will change. The Palestinians will continue their roundly supported quest for statehood. Obama will likely win a second term as president, and his unfettered new administration will force Israel's hand on the issue. Cast Lead II in Gaza will be a different story with Mohamed Morsi as president of Egypt.

Iran's threat might be existential, but let's hope Netanyahu has someone preparing a game plan for the Palestinian issue. It will continue to affect our lives as much or more than Iran will. And it will remain topical!

ror – there's no other word for it – against Arabs and their property, carried out by extremists as "price tag" attacks, on those rare occasions when Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's government actually dares to enforce the rule of law against settlers.

But for the time being, none of these occurrences have reached a critical mass

Beware of tikkunism and tikkunistas

Tikkun olam, Hebrew for making the world a better place, is an important component of Jewish religion and culture. But when removed from the wider Jewish context and artificially transformed into a radical "social justice" campaign, it can become a destructive cult. In its most immoral manifestation, this "tikkunism" is used by marginal individuals whose tenuous links to the Jewish people are appropriated in the war against Zionism and Israel.

The example of Judith Butler is a case in point. Butler, a post-modernist academic icon and anti-Israel activist from the University of California (Berkeley), was recently awarded the Theodor Adorno Prize by the city of Frankfurt.

As documented by journalist Benjamin Weinthal, the offensive move triggered many protests – Adorno achieved recognition without renouncing his Jewish identity, declaring: "To write poetry after Auschwitz is barbaric."

The decision to honour Butler is also a betrayal of Adorno's principled support for Israel following the 1967 war, when many European "intellectuals" turned their backs on the Jewish nation after we refused to play the role of victims seeking their pity. Similarly, the officials of the Berlin Jewish Museum, who gave Butler a platform from which to attack Israel and the Jewish people, have transformed this edifice into an anti-Jewish museum.

In contrast to her façade of "social values," Butler promotes the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement that seeks the destruction of Israel. As justification, she claims to believe in a "different Jewishness" than the one in whose name the Israeli state claims to speak," invoking what she refers to as traditions that "represent diasporic values, struggles for social justice, etc."

Butler attributes these opinions to "a Jewish education in Cleveland, Ohio, at the Temple under the tutelage of Rabbi Daniel Silver, where I developed strong ethical views on the basis of Jewish philosophical thought." This education was clearly minimal – Butler shows no knowledge of Jewish sources, including Prophets such as Jeremiah and Amos, whether in the rich original Hebrew or in translation.

Butler's "diasporic values" and "different Jewishness" are entirely fictitious. If she and her fellow tikkunistas had read the texts from which they claim to derive their values, they would know that Jewish social justice is inseparable from national identity and sovereignty in the Land of Israel. These principles began 2,000 years before any diaspora, with Abraham's journey from his father's home, so that he and his progeny – who became the Jewish people – could be a "light unto the nations." And generations later, after the Exodus from Egypt, the ethical commandments in the Bible were inextricably tied to the conquest of the Land of Israel and the responsibilities of nationhood.

Gerald Steinberg
in Jerusalem

Even post-modernists such as Butler – who "deconstruct" texts beyond recognition and whose own writing is often incoherent – would have trouble missing Jeremiah's passionate commitment to the Land of Israel.

His intricately written testimony exploring social injustices and warning of the impending destruction is punctuated by the promise of return to Jerusalem and the restoration of the Jewish nation.

Amos, another tikkunist favourite, came from Tekoa (south of Jerusalem) and preached in Samaria – both now labelled "occupied territory." His writings reflect his intense love for the Land of Israel.

Six centuries later, following the destruction of the Second Temple, and for 2,000 years in exile, Jews prayed daily for the return to Jerusalem. When the opportunity arose, in the context of modern political Zionism, the majority of Jews around the world joined in fulfilling this mission.

Butler knows none of this – her tirades against Israel are founded on ignorance and anger. She and other tikkunistas created the term "diasporic values" to remove themselves from the collective Jewish embrace of Israel, Zionism and Jewish national self-determination, preferring, even after the Holocaust, the status of helpless victim living in exile.

Indeed, the values of tikkun olam are meaningless without Jewish sovereignty in the Land of Israel. When these are separated, and tikkunism is used as a weapon against the Jewish nation-state, it loses its moral foundation.

The self-destructive chess champion

The late Bobby Fischer, perhaps the most brilliant champion in the annals of chess, was a deeply troubled soul brimming with contradictory impulses. He was secretive, yet candid, cruel, yet kind, naïve, yet well informed and serious, yet outrageous. But after all the adjectives were stripped away, he was a larger-than-life, self-destructive personality.

This is the confounding man whom Frank Brady profiles in his finely balanced biography, End Game: Bobby Fischer's Remarkable Rise and Fall – from America's Brightest Prodigy to the Edge of Madness (Crown Publishers).

Brady knows his subject like few other writers, having met Fischer when he was a child prodigy and having followed his career from day one. He uses his expertise, along with Fischer's family archives and Fischer's own e-mails, to burrow deeply into this maddening personality.

Born in Chicago in 1943, Fischer was raised by his single mother, Regina, who was homeless when she gave birth to her son and held a series of menial jobs, from stenographer to welder, before becoming a physician. Hans Gerhard Fischer, a Jewish German biophysicist to whom she was briefly married, is listed as his father on Fischer's birth certificate. But Brady speculates that Paul Nemenyi, a Jewish Hungarian physicist, may have been his biological father.

Fischer's older sibling, Joan, introduced him to the game when she bought him a plastic chess set for $1 in 1949. A shy, latchkey child whose mother was often away from home and who required diversions to stave off loneliness, he quickly took to chess and was a gifted player from the outset.

Although he was an erratic student, he was highly intelligent, having scored 180 on his IQ test. Fischer's brilliance in chess endeared him to a succession of mentors, including a teacher who treated him like a son and neo-Nazi who picked up his tournament entry fees.

By the age of 13, he was one of the strongest young players in the United States, having captured the U.S. junior championship and beaten a grandmaster. By 14, he had defeated Bent Larsen, one of the game's greats, and become the youngest ever international grandmaster. At 19, he held Mikhail Botvinnik, the world champion, to a draw. While still a teenager, Fischer achieved what no else had ever accomplished. He won 19 straight games against the world's strongest players.

Brady describes Fischer's style as "lucid, crystal-clear, economical, concrete and rational."

Chess obsessed Fischer, so much so that he apparently liked it more than sex. And the more fame he achieved, the more unpleasant he was, says Brady.

Arrogant and regal, he severed a relationship when a person disagreed with him, and showed disrespect toward weak players.

In 1972, Fischer was ready to challenge Boris Spassky, the world champion from the Soviet Union, for the title. He would be the first non-Russian in three decades to contest it.

The Fischer-Spassky match, which unfolded in Iceland, was regarded as a geopolitical drama, an extension of the Cold War, by the media in the United States and the Soviet Union. Fischer, an anti-communist, agreed with the appraisal. "I now feel a sense of mission to win the championship," he said.

After 20 games, Fischer was in the lead by a three-game margin. All he needed in the remaining four games was one victory or two draws. Spassky, realizing he was doomed, resigned by telephone, and Fischer was crowned the new champion.

When he was offered a $5 million purse to defend his title against Soviet challenger Anatoly Karpov, he set down 132 conditions. Exasperated by his unreasonable demands, the World Chess Federation stripped Fischer of his title.

By then, Fischer – who had never been circumcised, but had attended a Jewish kindergarten in Brooklyn – was a self-hating Jew, an antisemite.

Brady suggests that his antisemitism may have been rooted in his distaste for his mother's Jewish friends, his antagonism toward officials of the American Chess Foundation, most of whom were Jewish, and his friendship with a neo-Nazi mentor.

According to Brady, Fischer was psychologically ready for The Protocols of the Elders of Zion, a notorious Russian tract, when he spotted a copy in a Los Angeles used bookstore. "I carefully studied the Protocols," Fischer said. "I think anyone who casually dismisses them as a forgery... is either kidding themselves, is ignorant of them or else may be a hypocrite!"

With a certitude bordering on foolishness, Fischer claimed that communism was basically "a mask for Judaism."

Although he denied being anti-Jewish, Fischer, sadly and pathetically, was a raving antisemite. On a broadcast in Budapest in 1999, he declared, "As Adolf Hitler wrote in Mein Kampf, the Jews are not the victims, they are the victimizers!"

Due to his antisemitic comments, he was convinced that either the Mossad or an Israeli nationalist might assassinate him.

One of Fischer's friends, a Jewish chess player, said that he used the word "Jew" as a general pejorative.

After Fischer was stripped of his title, he withdrew into himself, although he continued to study the game. In what Brady describes as his "wilderness years," Fischer lived in Los Angeles' skid row, taking rooms in flophouses. Looking physically dishevelled, like a down-and-out, he developed a paunch and rarely had his hair or beard cut professionally.

Bobby Fischer in repose after winning the 1972 world championship.

During this period, he rejected a request by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for an interview, demanding $5,000 just to discuss the notion.

Emerging from retirement in 1992, he agreed to play Spassky in Serbia for a $5 million purse, knowing Serbia had been subject to U.S. sanctions. He won the match, collecting $3.6 million in prize money, but the United States issued an indictment for his arrest.

Fearing imprisonment, he became an exile, living in Serbia, Hungary, Switzerland, Japan and the Philippines. In 2004, he was arrested in Tokyo and spent the next nine months in a prison cell.

After renouncing his U.S. citizenship, Fischer asked for asylum in Iceland. Out of a sense of obligation, Iceland granted him citizenship in 2005. Iceland was grateful that Fischer had agreed to play for the chess championship in Reykjavik, the Icelandic capital.

Fischer soon grew tired of Iceland, grumbling about the country and its people. Fischer's disillusionment with Iceland was so fixed that he came to refer to it as a "God-forsaken country."

He died of a kidney ailment at 64 in the winter of 2008, refusing dialysis. Some believed his refusal was a form of suicide.

"Like the number of squares on a chessboard – an irony that nevertheless cannot be pressed too far – he was 64," writes Brady in a final dig.

New chief takes over Israel's tourism office

Allon wants to learn Canadian market, then boost business

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Over the past few years, the number of people from around the world travelling to Israel has grown and grown. Both 2010 and 2011 were record years, topping out at around 3.5 million visitors.

Tourists travelling on Canadian passports make up a modest proportion of that number – only around 70,000 – but the Ministry of Tourism wants to see that number grow to 100,000 in the next five years.

Coincidentally, that period corresponds to Ami Allon's planned sojourn here. Allon is the latest emissary from Israel sent to continue the development of the Canadian market. He follows Oded Grofman as director of the Israel Government Tourist Office (IGTO). Grofman recently returned to Israel after a five-year stint, during which Canadian passport holders travelling to Israel grew from around 60,000. Another 15 per cent were travellers who held Israeli or other passports.

When Grofman took over the tourism office in 2007, the ministry also viewed 100,000 as an attainable number for Canada, and even wanted to double the overall numbers to Israel to around five million.

There's nothing stopping the ministry from setting ambitious goals, but there's clearly still work to be done.

Allon enters the job with hopes of boosting the business. But first, he said, he's got to get a feel for the Canadian market.

"My first goal is to understand the market," Allon said. "I'm coming to a place I never lived in before."

Israel has lots to offer travellers of all stripes, he continued, but as someone with a background in marketing and advertising, he says you have to tailor your campaign to your audience.

With that in mind, he's planning to meet tour operators who sell Israel – and others for whom Israel is still an afterthought – meet community leaders and eventually travel across the country to determine the best way to promote the country. "The product has to fit the customer," he said.

Israel has much to offer travellers, Allon continued. It is unparalleled for its combination of sites with historic and religious significance – aspects that are well-known to the bulk of Jewish and Christian visitors.

"There is so much potential in Canada," Allon said. "There are many Jews and Christians who have never been there."

Once there, visitors tend to return. "We have a lot of repeaters," he said, "something like 60 per cent" and they tend to be great ambassadors for the country.

There's another side of Israel that Grofman promoted and which Allon likewise believes can attract a different kind of visitor – "sophisticated" travellers who could just as easily choose to vacation in Italy and France. For that potential audience, the IGTO promotes Israel's wineries, cuisine, adventure activities, spas and cultural offerings, which together with its rich history make it an unparalleled destination, he said.

Although Allon has never lived in Canada for an extended period, he has been here before. His first visit came 22 years ago, when as a 16-year-old he came to Toronto for a visit. It was a memorable 3-1/2 week vacation with his aunt, he recalled.

Along with his brother, he was exposed to big city life – "so many people."

The two hailed from a small kibbutz, Kiryat Anavim, just west of Jerusalem, and were not used to a city the size of Toronto. They learned to get around on the subway and by bus, and their aunt enrolled them in a sailing course on the Toronto Islands.

"It was an excellent time," and ever since "I had Canada in the back of my mind," he said.

After returning to Israel, Allon earned an MBA and worked for 4-1/2 years as a project manager for a Jerusalem advertising company. Then he worked as a cadet and assistant to the vice-president of marketing for the Israeli Ministry of Tourism.

He joined the ministry because, "I was really excited about the possibility of promoting Israel overseas... and working in the marketing and travel industry," he said.

During an on-the-job placement, he was sent to Toronto to work under Grofman to see how the office is run and to get practical experience.

"I was fortunate to go to this office. Oded was so welcoming and professional. [IGTO staff] Ellen [Melman] and Jerry [Adler] were very helpful," he said.

Back in Israel, two openings came up – one in Toronto and another in England. Allon said he was lucky to get the Canadian posting. "I always heard Canada was one of the best places to live in. I find the people are kind and welcoming."

Allon is being joined in Toronto by his wife, Mari, and children, Daniel, 8, Maya, 6, and Noam, one month old.

It's been suggested that a society will ultimately be judged by how it treats its most vulnerable members.

Since its inception 95 years ago, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto has been assisting Jewish Toronto's most vulnerable – whether they are abused women, families struggling to make ends meet; children who are going to school without a proper breakfast, or isolated seniors living on the fringe of society.

UJA Federation partners with over 100 agencies like Jewish Family & Child (JF&CS) where we allocate $4.7 million, including nearly $2 million for direct relief to our most vulnerable. Together we are providing those in need with a hand up so that they can transform their lives and live in dignity.

Shul exhibits photos of Polish shtetl

At the Stashover-Slipia Synagogue

Bill Gladstone
Special to The CJN

A series of old historic photographs from the Polish shtetl of Staszow has been quietly wowing visitors since being installed in the Stashover-Slipia Synagogue on Sultana Avenue in Toronto.

The photographs are to remain on permanent display in the shul's lobby.

"Everyone notices them when they come in," says synagogue president Jay Safer as he points out the various groups of framed photographs in the newly renovated space.

Offering a rare window into a lost world, the photographs show the marketplace, the mikvah, the cemetery, and other locales of Staszow (pronounced "Stashov") before the Germans destroyed the Jewish community. The photos range from the late 1890s to the 1930s.

The exhibit includes portraits of local personalities such as a fiddle player and the town water carrier. For poignancy, many of the photos seem to match the work of Roman Vishniac, who famously chronicled prewar eastern European shtetl Jewry with his camera.

There are group portraits of the Jewish soccer team and the socialist organization, the Bund, as well as shots of ragged children and elderly men with wizened faces and straggly beards. There is a beggar, a pipemaker, a seller of tallitot, even a portrait of one of the two photographers, Avraham Yossel Rotenberg, who died in the Holocaust.

The other photographer was his son, Simcha Rotenberg, who was born in 1916 and had worked with his father as a photographer in Staszow. After surviving the Holocaust, Simcha came to Toronto and worked as a plumber, a roofer and at various other trades – but not as a photographer. However, he "always had a camera in his hand," said his daughter, Rina Gottesman, of her father, who died about five years ago. "Photography was in his blood."

The photos on view are part of a much larger collection, segments of which have also gone to the YIVO Institute in New York and a Holocaust gallery in Toronto's Adath Israel Synagogue, Gottesman said.

Rotenberg saved many of the photographs during the war by giving them to a Polish non-Jew for safekeeping and retrieving them afterward. Others were sent abroad as postcards, which he later collected from the recipients.

The prints were donated to the shul by his widow, Shoshana Rotenberg, and family, who had previously loaned some prints to the congregation for its centennial celebration two years ago. Most members of the downtown Stashover Shul, which was located on Dundas Street near Beverley Street, were originally from Staszow.

"I think they're a treasure for the shul," said Mar-nie Solsky, the professional photographer who digitally restored and framed the photos for the congregation. "They wonderfully capture a moment of history that has since vanished."

The Stashovers moved north from downtown and built a synagogue on Sultana Avenue in 1964. They amalgamated with the Slipia Congregation, formerly of Oxford Street, in 1969.

Original Shaarei Shomayim to be demolished

Condos to replace shul's first permanent home

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

The building that originally housed Toronto's Shaarei Shomayim Congregation is being demolished.

"We hope to be done [with demolition] by the end of October," said Tony Manocchio, vice-president of construction at Urbancorp, the developer that bought the building at 840 St. Clair Ave. W., between Atlas Avenue and Winona Drive.

Although Urbancorp's designs aren't finalized and are contingent on zoning, the company is planning a mixed-use structure with commercial and retail outlets at ground level, and residential units on top.

For the past 40 years, the building was known as Hungarian House, a hub for the Hungarian community,

The former Shaarei Shomayim at 840 St. Clair Ave. W., as seen this summer before demolition started.

but there are still a few stained glass windows from the original synagogue.

"We've tried to see what is salvageable," Manocchio said. The windows are old, fragile, and difficult to save because of safety concerns, he added.

Toronto councillor Joe Mihevc said the building – designed by the architectural firm Kaplan & Sprachman, which also designed other synagogues – is not designated as historic. Mihevc said his office had requested that the stained glass windows be saved if possible.

Shaarei Shomayim, located on Glencairn Avenue since it moved from St. Clair in 1966, has restored and displayed four stained glass windows from the original building.

Al G. Brown, whose membership at the shul dates back to the late 1940s, told The C/N that some windows, and other items like benches and plaques, were taken at the time of the move.

He remembers that early services, dating back to 1936, were held in the basement of 840 St. Clair. It was the first permanent home for the shul, which was founded in 1928. The rest of the building was completed in 1947.

Once the sanctuary was built, there was no physical mechitzah to separate male and female worshippers. "The carpet [on the aisle running up the middle of the sanctuary] was considered the mechitzah," Brown said.

Although he added that the design wasn't common, "cross-the-aisle seating... was not considered a radical departure from Orthodoxy in the Toronto of those days," according to a history of the shul written by the late Stephen Speisman for its 50th anniversary in 1978.

Brown noted that his daughter, Golda, went to nursery school on St. Clair. "Associated Hebrew Schools had a couple of classes in the building, where the kids in the neighbourhood attended."

Bernard Green, 68, president of the synagogue from 1983 to 1984, grew up at the St. Clair building, attending nursery school in the late 1940s, then going to junior services in the chapel, playing basketball for the Shaarei Shomayim team against church teams as a high school student, and serving as a youth leader for the bar mitzvah club, where youngsters would eat a breakfast of doughnuts and cereal.

Green met his wife, Helene, at the shul when he was youth director and she was a youth leader.

The old building "was a large part of my life," he said.

Democratic Egypt takes illiberal view of free speech

A major foreign affairs controversy unexpectedly spilled over into Canada late last month when Egypt's prosecutor-general issued arrest warrants for two Canadian Coptic Christians over their alleged role in the making of the anti-Prophet Muhammad film Innocence of Muslims.

According to Reports

by PAUL MICHAELS

According to Canadian Press, Canadians Nader Fawzy and Jacques Attalla, along with several other Copts living in the United States, were accused of "offending Islam, insulting the Prophet Muhammad, inciting sectarian strife and jeopardizing Egypt's peace and independence."

Both deny any involvement with the film. And both fear for their safety and that of their families who could be targeted by Muslim extremists here.

The Toronto Star's Rick Westhead also wrote about their plight, noting that in addition to the Egyptian government's decree, Fawzy and Attalla "have also drawn the wrath of prominent imams in Egypt who have issued fatwas on both of them, urging Muslims anywhere in the world to behead them."

Westhead drew a parallel to the Salman Rushdie case, in which Iran issued a death sentence against Rushdie for his novel The Satanic Verses in 1989.

One possible motive for the Egyptian government's action against Fawzy is that, as Westhead explains, he's an activist who has criticized the way Copts are discriminated against in Egypt and has published a book, The Persecutions, a history of Coptic Christianity, that angered the authorities who banned it in Egypt.

In a Sept. 24 editorial on this disturbing development, the Globe and Mail wrote that "Egypt appears to be trying to make the crime of 'offending Islam' a worldwide one."

The Globe put Egypt's intimidation in a broader context: "This is a strange approach for a nascent democracy, and a bad signal from the Muslim Brotherhood, which holds power... Since when does one democracy purport to tell people in other democracies that if they speak out in certain ways, they could be charged and even put to death?"

Just as Egypt's president, Mohamed Morsi, was about to depart for the United States to deliver a speech at the United Nations, New York Times correspondents reported that he "said the United States must respect the Arab world's history and culture, even when that conflicts with western values."

Days later, U.S. President Barack Obama had something to say about this.

During his Sept. 25 appearance at the UN General Assembly, Obama devoted two-thirds of his 4,000-word address to an explanation about (and plea for) what he called universal democratic values of freedom and tolerance underpinned by the rule of law.

Because of intolerance and violent reaction to the offensive video, Obama spoke of the "need for all of us to address honestly the tensions between the West and an Arab world moving to democracy."

Invoking the words of former South African president

Nelson Mandela, he said that democracy is not just about casting a ballot, but "respects and enhances the freedom of others," and that involves tolerating views some of us strongly disagree with. Obama equated "true democracy with 'real freedom,' meaning individual rights such as free speech, 'the freedom of citizens to speak their minds and assemble without fear.'"

When he spoke at the UN the following day, Morsi rejected Obama's broad endorsement of free speech. While he said that Egypt now embraces democracy and human rights and even "respects freedom of expression," he emphasized that it cannot tolerate speech that insults and defames religion. The irony is that when he said free speech should never be allowed "to incite hatred against anyone... or one specific religion or cult," he apparently ignored the fact that for years Egypt has promoted antisemitic conspiracy theories through its official and semi-official media among other sources.

One fear is that Morsi's limit on free speech reveals a wider tendency toward intolerance and authoritarianism elsewhere in the region. Even Turkey, a non-Arab Muslim country that prides itself in upholding "secular" democratic values, has been moving in the direction of clamping down on free speech and currently has more journalists in jail than Iran and China combined.

We can only wait to see what happens in Egypt. Paul Michaels is director of research and senior media relations for the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs.

Canadian doctors to be trained at the Center

Raif said he continues to approach Canadian hospitals to advance more collaboration on behalf of the centre.

He said plans are also in the works to train Canadian doctors in Meir Medical Center's intensive care unit as part of an exchange program that could start as early as 2013.

"When it comes to quality of medicine and care, there's a lot to learn from Canada," Raif said.

One of the centre's major development projects is the building of a 25,000-square-foot orthopedic wing that will service the nation's young and aging populations. It's expected to cost around 214 million shekels (roughly $60 million Canadian).

According to the centre, Israel's population is expected to hit more than 9.5 million people by 2024, with an estimated 1.5 million elderly citizens.

"We're asking the Canadian public to help complete this project in addition to the children's wing," Raif said.

The centre is also working on a joint initiative with Keren Kayemeth Lelsrael - Jewish National Fund to build a children's park near the facility, he said.

"Meir Medical Center is spreading its wings in Canada to a degree we didn't foresee," Raif said. "We don't know why it's happening. Maybe hard work, luck... but all I can say is today, thank you, Canada."

On April 28, 2013, the centre will award its Medal of Merit at a gala dinner in Toronto to four prominent Canadian couples who've demonstrated "hard work; dedication to improving our social environment; extraordinary compassion and generosity, and an unwavering commitment to improving the lives of others."

Honorees for the evening will be federal Liberal party interim leader Bob Rae and his wife, Arlene Perly-Rae, Ana and Leslie Dan, Toby and Saul Feldberg, and Gemma and Sam Primucci, owners of the Pizza Nova takeout restaurant chain.

Rae is the evening's scheduled keynote speaker.

Staff from Meir Medical Center is also scheduled to attend the fundraising event.

Proposed Yom Kippur break meets opposition

Heated exchange erupts at Montreal city council

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A proposal by Mayor Gérald Tremblay's administration to adjourn a Montreal city council meeting early for Yom Kippur touched off a heated exchange among the three municipal parties and threatened to reignite Quebec's reasonable accommodation debate.

As it turned out, the council completed its work on Tuesday, Sept. 25 by 4 p.m., well before the start of the holiday.

The controversy began when Anie Samson, who leads the official opposition Vision Montréal on the council, objected to an earlier announcement by majority leader Marvin Rotrand, a longtime Snowdon councillor, that council business would stop at 5 p.m. that day, out of respect for Yom Kippur.

She called it an unjustified suspension of city business, considering only three out of 65 councillors are Jewish, and said that it contradicts her belief that city hall is a secular public institution.

Moreover, Samson said it set a precedent that opened the door to other religious and cultural communities wanting to have their holidays observed.

She suggested that the three Jewish councillors — all of whom, including Rotrand, are members of Tremblay's Union Montréal — should be allowed to take off the holiday without penalty. Normally, councillors are fined $100 if they miss a council meeting without a valid reason.

The rhetoric was ramped up when Richard Bergeron, leader of the other opposition party, Projet Montréal, accused Samson of stirring up antisemitism, which he termed "irresponsible."

Bergeron accepted the administration's decision to halt the council's proceedings out of respect for the Jewish councillors.

Rotrand claimed it has been the practice of city council to not meet on major Jewish and other communities' holidays for at least the 30 years he's been on council, going back to the days of former mayor Jean Drapeau.

The council meets monthly on a Monday afternoon and evening, and its work usually carries over to Tuesday during the day, finishing between 4 and 6:30 p.m., he said. Sometimes, the council does resume at 7 p.m., if necessary. Rotrand pointed out that the council never meets on Wednesdays, and if it didn't finish at 5 on Tuesday, it could reconvene on Thursday morning, Sept. 27. Rotrand sent a letter to the two opposition leaders to this effect a week earlier.

The executive committee does meet on Wednesday, but its meetings are not public.

Rotrand maintained that city council meetings by law must be open to the public, and sitting on Yom Kippur prevents the Jewish community from being full participants in the municipal process.

He said further that the council should no more meet on Yom Kippur or Ramadan than on Christmas. Samson, however, countered that Christmas is a statutory holiday. The argument escalated when Rotrand charged that Samson had "insulted" and "attacked" the Jewish community, and demanded a public apology. He resented her suggestion that the city administration is imposing a Jewish holiday on all councillors.

Samson, who represents Villeray-St. Michel-Parc Extension, refused, and she was supported by Vision Montréal leader Louise Harel, a former Parti Québécois cabinet minister, and her entire caucus.

Samson said she recognized the importance of Yom Kippur to Jews and is not against any particular community, but rather for what is right for the population as a whole. Rotrand also referred to Montreal's unanimous adoption in 2005 of a Charter of Rights and Responsibilities, in which the city pledged to respect religious and other diversity.

Rabbi Reuben Poupko, a member of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs executive, said the Jewish community has no expectation that city council should adjourn for a Jewish holiday.

"I'm confident city business will be able to carry on in the absence of Mr. Rotrand," he said.

The need for a "handful" of councillors to be away for a Jewish holiday should not be confused with the accommodation of Jewish employees who want to take religious holidays or educational institutions scheduling exams, for example, on Jewish holidays, Rabbi Poupko added.

March of the Living teaches the past, while inspiring the next generation

Vital Jewish identity program funded by UJA's Annual Campaign

By Daniel Koren

For close to a quarter of a century, the annual pilgrimage known as the March of the Living has been providing teenagers and adults from across the globe the chance to witness – and take part in – history, firsthand.

In Toronto, which supplies the largest delegation of March of the Living participants outside of Israel, the event is funded United Jewish Appeal's Annual Campaign.

Every April, thousands of Jews and non-Jews alike travel to Poland, to view the once flourishing Jewish community before visiting former concentration camps and ghettos, and then arriving in Israel in time to celebrate Yom Ha'atzmaut – Independence Day. At the height of the experience, the diverse group of participants gather together and embark in silent march, travelling the three kilometres that separate Auschwitz from Birkenau.

Though the trip can be an emotional journey, anyone who has ever taken part will confirm that it is also utterly life-changing and necessary.

Next year's March will be Polish-born survivor Mania Hudy's third. As difficult as

A participant of last year's March of the Living in Birkenau

it's been for her to return to Poland, she is grateful to help enlighten others through the tales of her experiences.

"It's an experience for the children unlike any other," says Hudy. "They have never lived through these stories, the kind of stories I told them. They saw what Auschwitz, Treblinka and the Warsaw ghetto were like. When they came back, these weren't the same children. Now they know what Israel stands for, and I noticed this transformation. I know that I will not live forever. They wanted to kill us then, but they did not achieve that. Now I have eight grandchildren who all come from me and I am just one woman. They will all learn how special Israel is to us because of the March."

Students like March of the Living Alumni Josh Wine confirm the influence the March has on its participants. "We were constantly reminded that the survivor generation is ageing and will not be around forever," said Wine. "I had the sense that it was extremely important not just to listen to the survivors' stories, but to save them in memory; it will be our duty in the future to caution younger generations of the great tragedy that was the Holocaust, by retelling survivors' stories."

The March of the Living is open to Jewish students in grades 11 and 12. Online registration opens October 10th – 29th, at www.marchoftheliving.org. Information meetings are scheduled for October 4th and 18th at the Beth Emeth Synagogue at 7p.m. Young Adult and Adult Missions are available as well. The Yiddish Language Alive and Well in Toronto

UJA Federation's Committee for Yiddish Presents Fidler Oyfn Dakh

By Daniel Koren

Made up by volunteers who share a common love and affinity for all-things Yiddish, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Committee for Yiddish has been making an impact on Toronto's Jewish community since the early 1960s, fostering a love of Yiddish through language, the arts, and other venues.

And how better to appeal to a broader audience than to offer a theatre workshop centered on reading the Yiddish-language version in transliteration of Fidler on the Roof (Fidler Oyfn Dakh), arguably the most popular and successful Jewish musical ever made. That's right. Participants of the ten-week workshop – made possible with the support of the J.B. and Dora Salsberg Fund at the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto – will be under the guidance of Gemini-award winning Canadian actor, director and performer, David Gale (Loving Spoonfuls, Churzpah a Go-Go). No experience in theatre or Yiddish is required, just a love for drama, comedy and the Jewish language.

Committee member Eda Zimler-Schiff claims the inspiration for the workshop came after Yiddish theatre groups in Montreal and New York were expanding. "There are a lot of young people who are not affiliated with mainstream Jewish community and its institutions and they look at Yiddish as a way of connecting with their roots and their culture," says Schiff. "It is a beautiful and creative language, and I think they realize it would be a tragedy to lose it."

"Yiddish is part of our DNA, our tradition, our heritage," states Mark Egit, Committee for Yiddish Chair.

Chaim Topol starred in the 1971 film version of Fidler on the Roof

UJA Federation's Committee for Yiddish also offers Yiddish language classes for adults, children and even pre-schoolers and a reading circle. It has built a strong presence in Toronto by networking with other communities and organizations. They've helped establish a Yiddish Studies Program at the University of Toronto, sponsor Yiddish classes at York University, offer, and play an active role in Holocaust Education Week, Toronto Jewish Film Festival, Ashkenaz Festival, and the Jewish Book Festival.

Fidler on the Roof, a Yiddish Theatre Workshop, begins October 15th and will take place on Tuesdays and Thursdays at the Workman's Circle, 471 Lawrence Ave. W. To register please call: 416.635.2883 ext. 5189 or email at committeeformyiddish@ujafed.org.

McGill, Hebrew U students study together

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — From a discussion with a Mohawk leader in a traditional longhouse at Kahnawake to an exchange with a justice at the Supreme Court in Ottawa, 10 Israeli university students were given an intensive introduction to Canada.

These law students from the Hebrew University of Jerusalem (Hebrew U) and 10 McGill University law students were participants in a new summer exchange program in human rights law.

The young Israelis and Canadians spent a month together in Montreal, three weeks of that in the classroom at McGill taking five one-credit courses in Human Rights and Armed Conflicts given by McGill and Hebrew U professors.

Although the perspective was global, the Palestinian-Israeli conflict inevitably came up, but considerable attention was also paid to the Canadian military experience in Afghanistan, and in particular, the questionable transfer of detainees to the Afghan security forces.

This was the joint program's second edition. In August 2011, a different group of McGill students spent a similar period at Hebrew U's Mount Scopus studying with their Israeli counterparts about competing rights in diverse societies.

This year's McGill cohort was a diverse group, the majority not Jewish, and the Israelis, although all Jewish, held a wide spectrum of political views. They included both a veteran of an infantry unit who had seen combat, and a conscientious objector, said McGill professor René Provost, who co-chaired the program with Prof. Tomer Braude of Hebrew U.

The courses covered such topics as the war on terror, peacekeeping, and children, as either victims or participants in conflict.

An encounter in Quebec City with an officer of the Royal 22nd Regiment, an Afghan war veteran who is also a lawyer, was especially enlightening for all participants, as was one with a federal Department of National Defence judge-advocate involved in the detainee transfer issue.

'Good rapport' exists between students

"The students asked many questions, hard questions," Provost said.

The students got along well. "There was a good rapport. It was wonderful to see the chemistry develop over their weeks together... The discourse was very open and wide ranging, but always rational and respectful."

The chance for Canadian and Israeli students to interact both academically and socially attracted McGill student Daphnee Vasseur to the program.

"Due to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and the compulsory military service in Israel, I thought the Israeli students would bring an interesting first-hand perspective on armed conflict," she said.

"The program was one of my best experiences of law school. Overall, we integrated with one another quite easily as everyone was very friendly," she added, and both sets of students were interested in learning about the others' country.

Vasseur said her understanding of Israel, especially its people's varying national and political identities, deepened.

"With so much exposure to news media concerning the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, it is so often easy to generalize a nation's people and believe they all think this one way and all subscribe to this one political platform."

"However, by having the opportunity to engage in politically and socially charged conversations with the Israeli students, I was able to grasp the richness of the diverging opinions and views that Israelis hold."

While she appreciated the academic content, Hebrew U student Noa Bornstein found most interesting the time spent informally with the Canadians and learning their differing views of their own country.

"Before... I thought that Canada and the United States were much alike. I thought Canada was just a lesser-populated version of the U.S.," Bornstein said. "I now realize I was totally wrong. The Canadian people are really different and, in many ways, they remind me of Israelis - just much more polite. I know it's a cliché, but I think it's true: Canadians are so nice."

One suggestion she has for future programs is to get the students acting in the community more. They visited a legal clinic at Project Genesis, and she said the students would have liked to do something like that.

Montreal offers the opportunity to learn about the everyday concerns of immigrants and refugees, many from armed conflict, Bornstein noted.

The program is run jointly by the McGill Centre for Human Rights and Legal Pluralism and Hebrew U's Minerva Centre for Human Rights. Plans are underway for its third edition next year in Jerusalem.

Almost the entire cost of the program, including the students' international travel and accommodation, is covered by the universities, largely through private donations. The Quebec Ministry of International Relations and, for the first time this year, Foreign Affairs and International Trade Canada also contribute.

Provost sums up the value of the program this way: "The students are getting a rare experience. There are not many programs where they get to spend a month with students [and faculty] from another country looking at global issues... For the McGill students, this was a way of demystifying a country that is represented in a certain way in the media."

TASHLICH AT YORK U POND: Jewish Learning Initiative on Campus director and Hillel at York University's Rabbi Aaron Greenberg, right, was joined by Hillel's program co-ordinator Tamara Caplan to lead a group of York students in a Tashlich ceremony for Rosh Hashanah at the university's pond. The ceremony is a symbolic way of casting off the sins of the previous year into a body of water.

לאורך ילדותי, מידי ערב היה אבי יושב וקורא את עיתון "מעריב". בשנות החמישים נחשב "ידיעות אחרונות" לעיתון נחות בעיני רוב הישראלים וראי אירופה, ורבים מהם היו מכורים למעריב שהוציא העורך המיתולוגי עזריאל קרליבך. וכך גדלתי קורא את מעריב מידי ערב אחרי שאבי סיים. עם השנים מצאתי את העיתון ימיני ומפות ומחות רלבנטי עבורי, אבל עם עלייתו לאינטרנט, גיליתי אותו שוב ואני מוצא בו עיתונים מעוינים כמו בן כספית ובן דרור ימיני, יונתן גפן ורבים אחרים.

דעיתו של מעריב נמשכת כבר למעלה מעשרים שנה והיא מתבטאת בכחות מגויים וקוראים, ונרעויות מעמיקים. אחת לכמה שנים התחלפו הבעלים בתקווה למצוא את הנוסחה המנצחת, אך היא לא נמצאה. לפני מספר שבועות הודיעה ההנהלה ל 2000 עובדי העיתון שאין בידיה לשלם את שכרם, וכפי שזה נראה עכשיו – גם לא יקרה נס – ייסגר עיתון מעריב אחרי ששירת את ישראל מאז קום המדינה. המשבר של העיתונות המודפסת מתרחש בכל העולם כי דור שלם של אנשים צעירים מגיל ארבעים ומטה ממעט שאיננו מותח עיתון יומי. זה קורה בקנדה, באירופה ומטבע העניין גם בישראל. בנוסף לאינטרנט, מחולקים עיתוני חיים ברכות ובאטובוסים ומקטונים משמעותית את הצורך לקרוא עיתון קנוי.

אני קורא כל יום על שביתות והמפגות של אנשי מעריב ובני נחמץ. זה נתון לחוסה של מכר וזיק, מישורו אהה מכיר שנים רבות. שמאושפז בבית חולים על ערש מותו וכולם מחכים לנס.

להיות פה להרגיש שם:

חוויות הגעגועים לישראל מוכרת לכל מי שהיגר לארץ אחרת, אם הוא מודה בכך וגם אם לא. רבים מאיתנו מחזירים יומית לערוץ הטלביזיה המהיר ומבחינות רבות מרגישים שהם בעצם בפתח תקווה, אבל זו כמובן אשלייה. השבוע כתבה מיקה אלמוג בעיתון הארץ טור נוקב בנושא ההגירה המהיר, ומתוכו בחרתי מספר שורות:

"לפני כמה שנים נסעתי לארה"ב לבקר חברים טובים שהיגרו לשם. בדרך משדה התעופה עברנו ליד אגם. חינך חברי ואמר: 'תיראי, הנה אגם. אני לא יודע עליו כלום. כל יום אני עובר לידו, נהנה מהכחול שלו וזהו'. אין לי מושג מה ההיסטוריה שלו, אני לא עוקב בחדרה אחרי גובה מימפלס המים שלו, ואין שום סיכוי שאי פעם אסכן את חיי למען האגם הזה...." מיקה אלמוג ממשיכה:

"ברבות השנים, מי שהשליח" מהדאגה למפלס המים של האגם, גם לא מכיר את השירים שנכתבו לחופיו, לא קורא לבנו בשיר ששרגה אליו משרות שקבורה לגדולות, ולדוד לא דוביאל את השפה שבה נכתב השיר, ודאי לא חשים הזדהות עם מילותיו. האגם כבר לא שלו, והלקט משמעותי מנסה לידו כבר לא שלו, והעתיד כבר לא שלו, ואילו של האגם המקומי, אותו הוא תופס כנסות שם להיות לאגם של מי שנשאר. עד שלא יהיה לו לאחוז."

אבל שישאר בינינו.

Rosh Hashanah in Seoul

Emma Csillag

During Rosh Hashanah last year, I sat outside my house with my friend discussing his sister, who couldn't make it home for the holidays because of distance. I remember thinking how sad that must be for her – to be prevented from spending the holidays with family because she was too far from home.

At the time, I had an idea what my year after graduation from university was to bring, but nothing had been cemented. Thus, I did not connect her situation to me. Little did I know I would be spending my next Rosh Hashanah a world away from Canada: at a Chabad centre in Seoul, South Korea.

I was not sure what to expect. It was the first time I had spent the High Holidays away from family and friends, let alone on the other side of the planet, in a land of Christians and Buddhists, and where fully half the population professes to have no religion. This is where I will be stationed for the next year, teaching English to grade-schoolers.

Luckily, a close friend from home put me in touch with his sister, who took me under her wing as if I was immediate family. She told me there was a Chabad centre in Seoul that opened in 2008, and that she would take me with her to services. I have never known such hospitality as shown to me by this girl and her boyfriend, both of whom I had just met. It would go on to reflect the people and spirit present at Chabad.

As I stood in the outdoor services reciting the silent Amidah, and as the rain began to lightly fall (a precursor to the typhoon that would hit shortly), my eyes welled with tears. I had left everything I knew and loved, and was weighed down with so much anxiety that I had almost backed out of the trip at the last minute. But here I was, reciting the Amidah alongside around 50 other Jews from around the world, coming together like family in such a far-flung place. I had just arrived to begin the biggest and scariest adventure of my life, and hearing those familiar prayers followed by wishes of "Shanah Tovah" melted away all anxieties I had about my journey.

So to all you nervous parents out there, just know that the simple touches of home can be present anywhere in the world, and those feelings of familiarity, comfort and family – of my bubbie spilling her wineglass or my mother's rock-solid matzah balls – were matched by a heartwarming "I'chaim" from Rabbi Osher Litzman (technically, the chief rabbi of South Korea) and the affection I felt from the most eclectic Jewish crowd I've ever encountered.

Guest Voice

It was a Rosh Hashanah I will never forget, one filled with warmth and newfound sensations of home and comfort – feelings that had been absent from my experience to that point. It took the familiarity of prayer and the family that is Judaism to kick-start this new and exciting chapter of my life.

Parshat hashavuah: fun, games, fingernails

If your Rosh Hashanah resolution included learning more Torah, now's the perfect time to get started. There are many excellent websites geared to promoting regular Torah study through the weekly portion, the parshat hashavuah. [<http://bit.ly/shavua1>] But sometimes, you might want to take a break from the classical commentators. Or get some help teaching the parashah to your kids. Or have a bit of fun. Here's where.

Rabbi Yael Buechler believes in keeping the weekly Torah portion at her fingertips – literally. At MidrashManicures.com, she has created art to grace her fingernails that is tied thematically to parshat hashavuah. For example, for Bereshit, her nails include the creation of light, the earth sprouting vegetation and of course, the first Shabbat. Why nails? "Re-envisioning education is what this is all about," she told the New York Times. "If I said come to a midrash course, I'd have five or six students. But Midrash Manicures? Twenty plus." [<http://bit.ly/shavua2>]

Do you think you really know the weekly portion? The folks at Joliet Jewish Congregation will keep you on their toes with a crossword puzzle for every parashah. Bonus content:

there are word search puzzles and word jumbles for most Jewish holidays, too. [<http://bit.ly/shavua3>]

For something different, go to Torah Tidbits and click on Parsha Pix & Stats. Every week, you'll get a screen full of cryptic pictures that relate in some way to the Torah portion. [<http://bit.ly/shavua4>] And for lovers of Torah and statistics, did you know that Parshat Bereshit has 146 verses?

It ranks eighth in the Torah – the same as Miketz, but Miketz is

Jewish & Digital

longer in lines, words and letters. Now you know. [<http://bit.ly/shavua5>]

Why should the adults have all the fun? Chabad.org's Parsha for Kids presents a family-oriented summary of each weekly portion, along with themed songs and videos with Muppet-like characters. [<http://bit.ly/shavua6>] For more for kids, check out Torah Tots' Parsha on Parade [<http://bit.ly/shavua7>] and Akhlah: Torah for Children. [<http://bit.ly/shavua8>]

It's quite rare that you come across a site that's educational and mouth-watering at the same time! Torah Portions is. As Suri Rosen explains, "Torah Portions is my attempt to develop Shabbos dishes that connect to the weekly parashah reading, both literally and conceptually."

Those connections are rarely obvious, and always witty – and delicious. For example:

- Parshat Balak tells the famous story about the prophet Balaam, who was summoned to curse the Jewish people. Balaam's donkey didn't take too kindly to his master's mission and told him so.

Suri's culinary take: burritos, which is Spanish for "little donkey."

- Parshat Naso tells of the nazir who takes a vow to abstain from wine and grapes and to allow the hair on his head to grow wild.

Suri's culinary take: she pays homage to the nazir's uncut hair, as symbolized by a plate of spaghetti.

- Parshat Trumah contains the instructions for building the portable mishkan (tabernacle), which the Israelites would carry through their wanderings in the Sinai.

Suri's culinary take: onion rings. Huh? Onion rings are hung on skewers that are reminiscent of the rods used to transport the mishkan. [<http://bit.ly/shavua9>]

A great site. (Full disclosure: I'm a friend of Suri's husband.)

(Fuller disclosure: it's a great site, regardless.)

A dance of passion

Rabbi Mark Fishman

Some aspects of Judaism are best appreciated when we move away from the cerebral and begin to enjoy them on an emotional level. Simchat Torah is a wonderful example. Think for a moment about what it is we do on this festival. We take our law book, our system of values and ethics, and we dance with the scrolls upon which they're written. I don't know of any other culture or people who so cherishes their law that they transform their scrolls into objects to dance with. And that is despite the lofty emphasis that is placed on the rigorous intellectual pursuits of its wisdom. How do we explain such a phenomenon?

I believe one approach can be found in an unusual midrash. The Talmud teaches (Tractate Shabbat 88b) that when the Torah was given to the Jewish people, each word that God spoke was accompanied with a beautiful fragrance, such that each scent filled the entire world.

What are we to make of these words of our sages? Perhaps we could suggest that prior to the rational understanding and intellectual recognition of the Torah, there was already an ephemeral sweetness that was appreciated by the senses. Sometimes, we are able to taste, hear or smell something that we have not yet fully appreciated. A person wearing perfume walks past us, and without even knowing the person, the fragrance is there – its scent gently lingers.

Clearly, when we enter into such territory, we have left the purely rational realm and have entered into something more emotional, more sensual. That, I believe, is what the midrash is trying to point out.

Rabbinic Reflections

Yes, the Torah is the word of God, and, yes, it contains laws, ethics, ways of behaviour and so much more. But before we get to the details, God wishes to hand us an object that is itself a thing of passion. He wants us to know that we are entering into a relationship built from strong loving foundations.

Anybody can "practise" the Torah, but are we able to love it? Can we take the Torah into the innermost chambers of our hearts and build a passionate fire that exudes all of the hallmarks of excitement and enthusiasm?

This Simchat Torah, when we come to the end of the Torah, we begin to roll it back to the beginning. In doing so, we restart our deep bond with its stories, lessons and values. But first, we dance. We hold the Torah close, and we celebrate. It is our "life and length of days," says one prayer. And life has to be lived not only with laws, but with love and laughter, too.

The Talmud states that everything goes after the ending (Brachot 12a). The manner in which we conclude any journey in life affects how we will remember it and how it will affect our lives.

We conclude the yearly reading of the Torah and the High Holiday season with great joy and celebration. May this positive energy remain with us and carry over into the New Year, Shanah Tovah.

Rabbi Mark Fishman is assistant rabbi of Congregation Beth Tikvah in Montreal.

Ingredients for a heart of wisdom

From time to time, I am mindful of the ancient prayer of the Psalmist, "O Lord, teach us to number our days that we may obtain a heart of wisdom." Across the gulf of the centuries, this is still a basic and paramount concern.

What are those essential elements, those vital virtues and qualities, that make up a heart of wisdom?

Firstly, a heart of wisdom must include the ability and the willingness to respond to change. Changes and alterations to our lives may seem good and desirable, or evil and pernicious, but what is supremely important is that we must learn how to respond to them.

Courage has been correctly described as the ability to relinquish what is familiar. As long as we can keep our minds open and alert, as long as we are able to entertain a new thought, surrender an old prejudice, we will remain vital, gain new ground and move forward in the search for a more abundant life.

Another widespread evil we must give up in order to achieve a heart of wisdom is envy. Much discontent results from comparing ourselves to others. We are sure that the other person is luckier than we are. But, of course, the envious person sees only a small part of the larger picture. How little we really know of what we are envying.

Long ago, rabbis taught that all kinds of hatred are curable except those that flow from envy. King Solomon wisely observed, "Envy is rottenness of the bones."

In order to achieve a

Bookmarks
Bernard Baskin

heart of wisdom, we must stop believing that happiness comes with the accumulation of material goods. Of course, no one can question money's power. The heaviest baggage to carry through life is an empty purse. Poverty condemns many to a squalid and incomplete existence.

But the inordinate and unending quest for material possessions brings neither piece of mind nor ultimate satisfaction. A rabbinic colleague recently warned of a new disease that he called "matriosclerosis." This is a disease that clogs the arteries of human concern.

I am sure that at one time or another, all of us have experienced moments of profound spiritual meaning. The moment on the bimah when the Torah is handed from the arms of one generation into the arms of the next. The moment when we stand by the bedside of a loved one and hold a feeble hand. The moment when we behold a son or daughter standing at the marriage altar. The moment when a child is born into the world. The moment when after sickness, there can be health again. After anguish, we hope again. After death, there is life again.

When you consider life's highest moments, they turn out to be spiritual in nature. It is this yearning that we call "the neshamah," the soul or spirit at the centre of our being.

What is a heart of wisdom? It is composed of at least these four ingredients: the ability to respond to inevitable change, the need to eliminate the cancer of envy, to properly evaluate the quest for material possessions and to reach out for the anchorage of spirituality.

Writing helps poet deal with personal tragedies

Cynthia Gasner
Special to The C/JN

Music, dance and poetry have helped Mary Lipton, 88, deal with the numerous tragedies she has faced. And the arts have helped her appreciate the beautiful things she has seen.

Lipton recently published a book of poems titled Behind the Spanish Wall. The 46 poems explore the happiness of being a mother, grandmother, dedicated volunteer and creative artist, as well as her suffering from health ailments, family conflict and losing her beloved husband to Alzheimer's.

"I began writing poetry because I had to get my distress out. And I became fascinated with flowers and nature and wanted to express my joy," Lipton says.

Born in Lodz, Poland, her mother and father, Aaron and Helen Hoffman, moved to Tel Aviv before coming to Canada when she was six years old.

In her poem The Abduction, Lipton describes her mother's frantic search for her when she was kidnapped at the age of three. A woman saw the abductor with a little girl and knew that the abductor did not have any children.

Lipton describes her mother's successful pursuit of the woman, writing, "The mother and child would have known loss and despair, if not for the woman who had led the mother there."

She met her husband, Victor Lipton, when she was 14 years old. He left for war at 15. He returned home in 1946 and they were married in 1947.

In an interview with The C/JN, she says her husband suffered from post-traumatic stress disorder ((PTSD) from his war experiences that led to outbursts in their home.

In the poem The Soldier's Wife (PTSD), she reflects on the tragedy of war.

If Love Alone Could Bring You Back is her insightful and stirring attempt to cope with her husband's memory loss. This poem was published by the Alzheimer's Society.

At a Holocaust memorial ceremony at Earle Bales Park, her poem Never Again was read. She has been asked by the Reena Foundation and other charitable organizations to write about their agencies' work with the handicapped and disabled.

Lipton has loved music since childhood. She and her husband frequently vacationed in Spain, where she became fascinated by flamenco music.

After unsuccessful muscle surgery to one of her calves in 1958, she began a strenuous exercise regime that included heel and toe exercise on a wooden board.

"The exercise reminded me of Spanish dancing," she says, "so I for cancer research.

Lipton has volunteered for the Elizabeth Fry Society, Circle of Care, the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living and other organizations.

It is her creativity that has kept her spirits high, and although she now copes with aches and pains, she still responds with movements of her feet and hands to music.

She says she is proud of her three children and seven grandchildren. Her sons are Garry and Bob Lipton, and her daughter, Susan Kadis, served as Liberal member of Parliament for Thornhill.

In her poem Flamenco Passion, Lipton expresses her zest for life. "Walking or standing is such a chore/ isn't that what feet are for?"

She continues, "Looking back, I have no regrets. I loved the dance with the castanets."

Behind the Spanish Wall was published by the Ontario Poetry Society. For more information, call 905-889-7563.

Jewish dental fraternity transcends borders

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Seattle periodontist Michael Spektor traces his involvement with the 105-year-old Alpha Omega International Dental Fraternity to a convention in Montreal in the early 1970s.

"They had me at hello," the 2012 international president said in an interview at the University of Toronto dental school.

He was in town to meet with local Alpha Omega (AO) members and speak at AO Toronto's Fraternity Night dinner at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation Sept. 10.

Recalling his first convention as a dental student, he described himself as a "pisher from Chicago, and I knew everything." But witnessing an award presentation by a father to his son, and hearing Harikvah as part of the program, made a deep impression on Spektor, a son of Holocaust survivors who was born in a displaced persons camp in Germany after the war.

Alpha Omega, which represents about 6,000 dentists and dental students in 23 countries, was started in Baltimore to combat antisemitism in dental schools. However, the organization has also been involved in other types of projects from its inception, said Spektor, whose wife, Wendy, is also a dentist and an Alpha Omegan. The couple, who have two grown sons, are a team professionally as well as personally.

Michael Spektor

Among AO's current projects is its Global Oral Health Initiative, with outreach in places including Guatemala, Rwanda and Latvia.

In Israel, Alpha Omega built the Hebrew University-Hadassah School of Dentistry and the dental school at Tel Aviv University, Spektor said. In the past year, the AO Foundation disbursed almost $250,000 for projects in Israel and worldwide.

Although antisemitism is not the focus it once was, the organization still addresses it, taking a stand against divestment from Israel campaigns, for example.

Locally, Alpha Omega Toronto has contacted U of T dean David Naylor to express concerns about Israeli Apartheid Week, said Alan Vinegar, president of AO Toronto.

Earlier this summer, Spektor visited AO's chapter in Toulouse, France, where Muslim radical Mohamed Merah killed a rabbi and three children at a Jewish school in March, triggering more than 90 antisemitic attacks in the next 10 days. "It really struck close to home," Spektor said, after meeting relatives of one of the victims.

One of the projects that Spektor finds particularly meaningful is the Alliance for Oral Health Across Borders, to which AO was a signatory. He took part in the first training session for Israeli and Palestinian dental students.

The idea, he explained, is that regardless of political beliefs, healers can transcend areas of conflict. "We don't have to agree, but we can move forward."

Outside of AO, Spektor channels his passion for Israel and tzedakah into other Jewish organizations. A former president of the Jewish Federation of Greater Seattle, he is currently on the national council for AIPAC - The American Israel Public Affairs Committee, and has also been involved in Holocaust education.

AO's Toronto chapter, the largest in the world with more than 600 members, offers dental care to nursing home residents and Holocaust survivors, Spektor noted. Montreal - home to Spektor's predecessor, Michael Tenenbaum - has the second-largest chapter, with 250 members.

In fact, Spektor is somewhat of an anomaly in AO at the moment - his successor will be Marcy Schwartzman of Vancouver, and in 2014, Avi Wurman, who practises in Oshawa, Ont., will take the reins of the international organization.

"I'm the one North American that's not Canadian," Spektor quipped.

Fitness Corner in review

For five years, I have written Fitness Corner on a monthly basis. As a personal trainer and fitness enthusiast, I have made fitness my life. Through this column, I have had the opportunity to share my love for health and fitness with you, and I have tried to motivate you by showing you all the different aspects of health and fitness.

I have written often on the benefits of regular exercise – how it lowers your risk of heart disease, obesity and all types of cancers, that consistent exercise can improve your mobility, arthritis pain, back pain, diabetes and immune health.

We looked at the importance of weight training, yoga and stretching to improve our balance and strength and maintain activities of daily living as we age. I have shared the importance of kegel exercises for everyone, men and women alike, as well as core training for long-term support and the health of your back.

I have told you of the many benefits of boxing, tai chi, pole walking, dancing, aerobics, Pilates, aquafit and many more forms of exercise. And I shared how vigorous activity before can help you recover after surgery, and even help prevent prostate cancer.

I have written about the importance of weight training in slowing down and preventing osteoporosis as well as during and after menopause for preventing postmenopausal diabetes and heart disease. We talked about how seniors who resistance train can improve their health and wellness into their 70s, 80s and beyond, which I hope showed you it is never too late to start.

I showed you how to start or pick a program that suits your needs and fitness level. Advised you on treating and preventing injuries for flexibility and long-term strength.

Educated you on the importance of sleep and hydration along with exercise in your daily routine.

Over the years, I hope I have inspired you to move and try to make your workouts fun, challenging and safe.

Even though I won't be here anymore, you can join me, and more fitness columns. Join my Facebook group at Felyce's Fitness Corner. Want to learn more, e-mail me at felycesfitness@rogers.com.

Beth Tikvah Synagogue HOLOCAUST FILM SERIES & PANEL DISCUSSION October 16, 23, 30 and November 6

In 1939 there were about 3.5 million Jews living in Poland; over 10% of the population. Their relationship with the mostly Catholic population of Poland varied tremendously. In some cases there was bitter anti-Semitism; in other cases the Jews simply made the best of things with their Gentile neighbours and tried to get along. For most who were not assimilated there was always a separation. In the end over 90% of Polish Jews were murdered, mainly by the Nazis.

These three excellent films depict the spectrum of the various relationships of Jews and Poles during World War Two.

Tuesday October 16, 8:00 p.m.

IN DARKNESS depicts the saving of a group of Jews in the sewers of Lvov (Lemberg) during the war. It aptly portrays the changing sentiments of the Polish worker who saves them. $5.00 cash at the door.

Tuesday October 23, 8:00 p.m.

THE COURAGEOUS HEART OF IRENA SENDLER tells the story of a righteous Gentile who saves Jewish children from the horrors of the Warsaw Ghetto. $5.00 cash at the door.

Tuesday October 30, 8:00 p.m.

REMEMBRANCE is a saga of romance and survival. Two lovers, one Jewish and one Polish, try to escape a brutal concentration camp while contending with a miserable anti-Semite; all of this transpires across a tumultuous background of war. $5.00 cash at the door.

Tuesday November 6, 8:00 p.m.

PANEL DISCUSSION to discuss the three films and the relationships of Poles and Jews. Panel: Rabbi Jarrod Grover, Nate Leipziger, prominent Holocaust survivor, Professor Frank Bialystock, University of Toronto; Margaret P. Bonikowska, Editor/Publisher of Gazeta GAZETA, Canadian Polish language newspaper, Professor Anna Shternis, University of Toronto. Moderated by Gerald Zidenberg. No Charge.

Longtime Mount Sinai obstetrician dies

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Dr. Bernard Ludwig, a longtime obstetrician/gynecologist at Mount Sinai Hospital who died at age 89 on Erev

Rosh Hashanah, will be remembered for his dedication to medicine and his devotion to his patients.

Before giving up his obstetrics practice at age 75 – he worked as a gynecologist and general practitioner until age 86 – he delivered 20,000 babies.

Ludwig, a Toronto native who graduated from University of Toronto in 1945, served in the Canadian Army Medical Corps and then began his obstetrics practice in 1950, when Mount Sinai was in a small house on Yorkville Avenue.

In his eulogy, Ludwig's son-in-law Mark Gwartz, said that his father-in-law's life was medicine, but he had no use for the politics of the hospital or organized medicine. "He was entirely focused on patient care and providing the best quality and appropriate treatment. His compassion and understanding of the human condition, his sixth sense of wisdom and experience, his analytical skill and technical surgical expertise, are what set him apart from his colleagues."

"He would give each patient as much time as they needed to discuss a problem. His reputation was built on the premise that he was always available and would be there for the delivery."

Gwartz said a typical day for Ludwig began at 5 a.m., and he returned home about 7 or 8 p.m. to return patients' calls, often until 11 p.m. "That is unless there was a patient in labour, in which case he would catch a power nap in an empty hospital bed."

What is remarkable, Gwartz said, is that he kept this pace for more than 40 years.

Among the honours given to him was the Bernard Ludwig Fellowship in Maternal/Fetal medicine created at University of Toronto/Mount Sinai Hospital, and in 2009, a fellowship was set up at Herzog Hospital in Israel to train immigrant Ethiopian nurses.

Gwartz said that aside from medicine, Ludwig was a devoted husband, father of four and grandfather of 13. "He always treasured education. He would tap his head and say, 'This is not a coconut. It is a cranium with a brain. Use it.'"

"He set the bar high for all of them, and he would always tell his patients how proud he was of their accomplishments," Gwartz said.

Irene Borins Ash, Ludwig's niece, said her uncle touched people's lives because he "sincerely cared for them. He made people feel special because they mattered to him. He listened to each patient, he listened to me. He helped me believe in myself, and he helped others believe in themselves."

Ludwig is survived by his wife, Margaret Florence-Ludwig. He also leaves children Caren and Ryan Shoychet, Samuel and Katherine, Florence and Mark Gwartz, John and Marsha and 13 grandchildren.

LUDWIG, Dr. Bernard ז"ל

Peacefully on Sunday, September 16, 2012 at Mount Sinai Hospital, in his 90th year surrounded by his family. Beloved husband of Margaret Florence-Ludwig. Devoted father and father-in-law of Caren and Ryan Shoychet, Samuel and Katherine Ludwig, Florence and Mark Gwartz, and John and Marsha Ludwig. Dedicated brother and brother-in-law of Beverly and the late Sidney Borins. Loving grandfather to Danielle, Jake, Claudia, Charles, Barnett, Sofia, Harry, Steven, Brianne, Jay, Benjamin, Ray, and Louis. Special thanks to his caregivers Emma, Nelly, and Guadalupe, and to the Mt. Sinai Nursing Staff. Dr. Bernard Ludwig was a very well known and admired Obstetrician/Gynaecologist at Mount Sinai Hospital for over 50 years. During his career he delivered over 20,000 babies, giving personal and undivided attention to each of his patients. His wisdom, expertise, and compassion will never be forgotten by all those he touched. Services were held at Benjamin's Park Memorial Chapel on Wednesday, September 19, 2012. Interment at Shedlovo Synagogue Section of Dawes Road Cemetery. Shiva ended on Sunday evening at 25 Gardiner Road. In order to honour his legacy, donations can be made to the Dr. Bernard Ludwig Special Fund at Mount Sinai Hospital Foundation, 416-586-8203, or the charity of your choice, would be greatly appreciated.

Knishes or deli rolls to eat in the sukkah

Eileen Goltz
Special to The CJN

Every year I serve the same soups, cholent and meatballs in a bread bowl in the sukkah.

I decided to buck the tradition this year and reinvent my menu for the week of meals that will be served outdoors. That being said, I'm not going to go totally off the rails and serve something wildly outside the realm of Jewish cuisine, but rather I'm turning to the deli roll and knish to serve as a reminder that different is still delicious.

A knish is the name given to a baked or fried dumpling. Dough wrapped around a savoury potato, meat, onion, kasha, and/or vegetable filling. Super easy to make, they can be small-sized appetizers or meals all by themselves. Think calzone without the pizza sauce and cheese.

A deli roll in its simplest form is a sheet of puff pastry typically slathered with sweet or savoury mustard wrapped around corned beef, pastrami, turkey or a combination of these meats and/or vegetables rolled up jelly roll style, baked and served with extra mustard.

These descriptions of these two delicious treats don't do justice to the dishes, but the following recipes, when-tasted, take over where the words end.

NOTE: For those with a vegan or vegetarian in the house, feel free to substitute grilled eggplant, portabella mushrooms or any combination of mashed potatoes and grilled vegetables for the meat in any of the recipes

CLASSIC POTATO KNISH

Dough

- 2 1/2 cups flour
- 1 tsp. baking powder
- 1/2 tsp. salt
- 1 large egg
- 1/2 cup oil
- 1 tsp. white vinegar
- 1 3/4 to 1 1/2 cup water

Filling

- 3 medium russet potatoes, peeled and quartered, boiled until soft
- 1 medium onion, diced small
- 1 tbsp. olive oil
- 1 tbsp. margarine or butter
- 1/2 tsp. salt
- pepper to taste
- 1 egg yolk
- 1 tsp. water

To make the dough, combine the flour, baking powder and salt in a bowl and mix well. In another bowl, combine the egg, oil, vinegar and water. Whisk to combine and add the egg mixture to the dry ingredients in the other bowl. Mix to combine. Once the mixture is combined, dump it out onto a lightly floured surface and knead it until it becomes smooth, 2 or 3 minutes. Return the dough to the bowl, cover it and refrigerate it at least 1 hour but no more than 2 days.

Place the cooked potatoes in a large bowl. Heat the margarine or butter and oil in a skillet and add the onions. Cook over a medium heat, stirring frequently for about 25 to 30 minutes and they are caramelized. Add the onions to the bowl with the potatoes and smash them all together. Add salt and pepper to taste.

Preheat oven to 375. Line a large baking sheet with sides with parchment paper. Divide the dough in half. On a wellfloured surface, roll the first half of the dough into a thin sheet approximately 12 by 12 inches square. Spoon a 2-inch thick log of potato filling across the bottom of the dough square. Roll up jellyroll style making sure it's not too tight. Roll so that the filling has been wrapped twice. Tuck or trim the ends. Repeat with the remaining dough and filling.

Cut each log in half and then each of the halves into halves again. Pinch closed one side of each piece to form the bottom of the knish. Slightly flatten the knish and place it on the parchment paper on the cookie sheet. You can pinch the top closed as well if you prefer, but make sure there is enough of an opening to allow the steam from the filling to escape.

In a bowl, combine the egg and the water and whisk. Brush the top of the knish with the mixture and bake 40 to 45 minutes, until golden. Makes 8. This recipe can be doubled or tripled and you can make them smaller.

Modified from a recipe posted on Aish.com

MEAT KNISH

- 1 large onion, diced
- 2 stalks celery, diced
- 1/2 cup diced green pepper
- 3 tbsp. oil
- 1 1/4 lb. ground beef, turkey or chicken
- 1/2 tsp. salt
- 1/4 tsp. pepper
- 2 tbsp. tomato or barbecue sauce
- 1 3/4 cups flour
- 2 tsp. baking powder
- 1/2 tsp. salt
- 5 tbsp. margarine
- 2/3 cup nondairy creamer or water
- mustard to taste

Meat Mixture: In a 10-inch skillet, fry onions, celery and green pepper in oil until soft, but not brown. Add meat and sauté until brown. Add salt and pepper. Stir in 2 tablespoons of tomato sauce. Remove from heat and cool.

Dough: Combine flour, baking powder and salt in small bowl. Cut margarine into dry ingredients with two knives until mixture reaches consistency of corn meal. Add nondairy creamer, a few drops at a time, mashing with fork after each addition, until dough holds together in a ball.

To Assemble: Roll out dough on floured board into a rectangle, about 1/4-inch to 1/2-inch thick. Spread dough with mustard, then spread meat mixture on dough. Roll up jellyroll fashion. Place roll on ungreased pan, seam side down. Prick dough in several places with fork to allow steam to escape.

Classic Jewish treat

Preheat oven to 350. Bake until brown, about 45 minutes. Remove from oven and let stand a few minutes before slicing.

Modified from Spice and Spirit The Complete Kosher Jewish Cookbook by Esther Blau, Tzirel Deutsch, Cherna Light.

MINI BEEF AND SWEET POTATO KINISHES

2 cups flour
1 1/2 tsp. baking powder
1/2 tsp. salt
1/4 cup water
1/4 cup oil
3 eggs and 1 egg white
1 1/2 lb. beef, cooked and drained
4 green onions, sliced thin
1 baked sweet potato, cut into small pieces
1/2 tsp. salt
1/2 tsp. pepper
1 to 2 tbsp. water or beef broth

Preheat oven to 400. Line two cookie sheets with sides with parchment paper or foil. In a bowl, combine the flour, salt and baking powder. Add 1/4 cup oil, 1/4 cup water, 1 egg and 1 egg white. Mix to combine and then set aside. In another bowl, combine the cooked beef, green onions, 1 egg, sweet potato, salt, pepper and water.

Roll out the dough until it's about 1/4 inch thick or less. Cut out as many 3- to 4-inch circles as you can, and place a small spoonful of filling in the middle of each circle. Pull up the sides of the circle and press them together to make a dumpling-like packet. Place them on a cookie sheet and brush with a beaten egg. Bake for 15-20 minutes golden brown. Makes 3 to 3 1/2 dozen depending on the size.

HONEY DIJON DELI ROLL WITH CARMELIZED ONIONS

1 large onion, very thinly sliced
1 tbsp. minced garlic
2 tbsp. olive oil

Gabila's square kinshes

1 sheet puff pastry, defrosted
1/4 cup honey Dijon mustard
1/2 lb. pastrami, thinly sliced
1/2 lb. turkey breast, thinly sliced
1 egg
1 tbsp. warm water non-stick vegetable spray additional sautéed onions and mustard for garnish

Preheat oven to 375. Cover a large cookie sheet with aluminum foil. Spray with non-stick vegetable spray. In a large skillet, heat olive oil and sauté the onions and garlic stirring occasionally, until onions are caramelized.

Spread a thin layer of mustard on puff pastry. Place a layer of pastrami on the mustard, covering the entire sheet, using the entire 1/2 pound. Place a layer of turkey on the pastrami, covering the entire sheet, using the entire 1/2 pound. Evenly spread the caramelized onions over the layer of turkey. Roll. Place on the prepared cookie sheet

With a sharp knife, make several diagonal slits across the top of the roll. Whisk together the egg and water. Brush over the top of the roll. Bake for 45 minutes until top of roll is golden brown. Serve sliced with additional mustard and sautéed onions.

FILLO DELI ROLL

12 to 14 sheets of filo dough
4 tbsp. mustard
2 tbsp. Dijon seeded mustard
2 tbsp. honey
1/4 lb. sliced salami
1/4 lb. sliced turkey
1 onion, sliced and sautéed in 1 tbsp. olive oil and 2 tsp. brown sugar
1 egg yolk

In a skillet, sauté the onion and brown sugar in the oil until soft. Remove from heat and set aside.

Preheat oven to 350 and line a cookie sheet with parchment paper or grease it very well. Place 6 to 7 sheets of filo on a work surface. Spread 2 tablespoons of yellow mustard and 1 tablespoon of Dijon mustard on top of the filo dough, but make sure to leave about 1 in. around the edges.

Place 1/2 of the salami and 1/2 of the turkey on top of the mustards then drizzle the honey over the top of the meat. Place half of the sautéed onions on one end of the dough. Start to roll the dough from the end with the onions.

Placed on the prepared cookie sheet, seam side down. Repeat the process with the remaining ingredients. Brush the top with the beaten egg yolk and sprinkle the sesame seeds on the top. Cut 3 or 4 slits in the top of the roll to allow the steam from the filling to escape. Bake for 30 to 40 minutes or until the top is golden. Serves 8 to 10 depending on the size of the pieces you cut. This recipe can be doubled or tripled.

U.S. will 'prevent Iran from obtaining nuclear weapon'

Sam Ser
Times of Israel

The United States "will do what we must to prevent Iran from obtaining a nuclear weapon," President Barack Obama told the United Nations General Assembly in a lengthy address on Sept. 25, offering a stern warning to Tehran but stopping short of issuing the explicit red line Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has called for in recent weeks.

In addition to taking Iran to task for oppressing its own people, backing the dictatorial regime of Syrian President Bashar Assad, and supporting terrorism around the world, Obama also called for peace between Israel and Palestinians in which a "secure, Jewish state of Israel" exists next to "an independent, prosperous Palestine."

Yet these issues were secondary to other developments in the Middle East, as the American president addressed the violent protests across the Muslim world sparked by the anti-Islam film Innocence of Muslims. While he denounced the film, Obama poured greater criticism on those who exploited it to foment violence, and stated that democracy and freedom of speech were the only remedies for offensive speech.

"The strongest weapon against hateful speech is not repression," Obama said, "it is more speech – the voices of tolerance that rally against bigotry and blasphemy, and lift up the values of understanding and mutual respect."

Obama began his address by paying tribute to the U.S. Ambassador to Libya, Chris Stevens, killed at the U.S. Consulate in Benghazi two weeks ago amid protests over the anti-Islam film.

"Stevens embodied the best of America. Like his fellow foreign service officers, he built bridges across oceans and cultures, and was deeply invested in the international cooperation that the United Nations represents," the president said. "He acted with humility, but stood up for a set of principles – a belief that individuals should be free to determine their own destiny, and live with liberty, dignity, justice, and opportunity."

The wave of attacks of the last two weeks, Obama said, "are not simply an assault on America. They are also an assault on the very ideals upon which the United Nations was founded – the notion that people can resolve their differences peacefully; that diplomacy can take the place of war; and that in an interdependent world, all of us have a stake in working towards greater opportunity and security for our citizens."

Today, he said, "we must affirm that our future will be determined by people like Chris Stevens, and not by his killers. Today, we must declare that this violence and intolerance has no place among our United Nations."

Surveying the developments of the Arab Spring, Obama added, "The turmoil of recent weeks reminds us that the path to democracy does not end with the casting of a ballot. Nelson Mandela once said: 'to be free is not merely to cast off one's chains, but to live in a way that respects and enhances the freedom of others.'"

"True democracy demands that citizens cannot be thrown in jail because of what they believe, and businesses can be opened without paying a bribe. It depends on the freedom of citizens to speak their minds and assemble without fear; on the rule of law and due process that guarantees the rights of all people. In other words, true democracy – real freedom – is hard work."

Morsi demands Palestinian rights

Times of Israel

Egypt's new President Mohammed Morsi made his debut on the global stage at the United Nations on Wednesday, celebrating himself as the nation's first democratically elected leader who was swept into office after what he called a "great, peaceful revolution."

Morsi, an Islamist and key figure in the once-banned Muslim Brotherhood, said in the UN General Assembly on Wednesday that the first issue for the world body should be certifying the rights of the Palestinian people.

"The fruits of dignity and freedom must not remain far from the Palestinian people," he said, adding that it was "shameful" that UN resolutions are not enforced.

He decried Israel's continued building of settlements on territory that the Palestinians claim for a future state in the West Bank.

The Egyptian president reaffirmed his country's commitment to uphold its international obligations, foremost the UN charter.

Regarding the ongoing civil war in Syria, he said he will not rest until it is brought to an end.

He called the fighting there, which opposition groups say has killed at least 30,000 people, the "tragedy of the age" and one that "we all must end."

He invited all nations Wednesday to join the effort being led by Cairo in a bid to stop the bloodshed that began about 18 months ago when opposition figures rose up against President Bashar Assad's regime. He and his father before him have run the country as a dictatorship for 40 years.

Morsi condemned the US-made video denigrating Islam's Prophet Muhammad as an obscenity. He insisted that although Egypt is in favor of freedom of expression, that freedom does not allow for attacks on any religion. The Egyptian president called on the General Assembly to confront discrimination based on religion and race.

He also condemned the violence that swept Muslim countries in reaction to the video, including an attack on the U.S. consulate in Benghazi, Libya that killed the American ambassador and three other U.S. citizens.

Morsi's remarks were in direct opposition to U.S. President Barack Obama's insistence on all countries protecting freedom of speech at the General Assembly on Tuesday.

Iran will continue to enrich uranium: Ahmadinejad

Mike Eckel
Times of Israel

Iran's President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad told the UN General Assembly Sept. 26 that his country was under threat of military action from "uncivilized Zionists."

"Continued threat by the uncivilized Zionists to resort to military action against our great nation is a clear example of this bitter reality," he said in the address, his last as president before his second term ends next summer.

Ahmadinejad lamented that the major world powers had allied with the devil, and suggested a new world order that would end the "hegemony of arrogance," bolster human dignity and bring universal happiness.

He also said he did not believe Muslims, Christians, Jews and Buddhists had "any problems with each other," but protested the "arms race and intimidation by nuclear weapons and weapons of mass-destruction by the hegemonic powers." The military threats by the Zionists to his country, he said, were a case in point.

He said "a state of mistrust has cast its shadow" over international relations, and that there was "no trusted or just authority to help resolve world conflicts."

The U.S. boycotted Ahmadinejad's speech, as did Israel. Canadian diplomats walked out as he took the podium.

Outside the UN headquarters in New York City, thousands of people filled a plaza in a protest against the Iranian regime.

The protest included appearances by former New York City mayor Rudolph Giuliani and former U.S. House speaker Newt Gingrich. Syrians also protested Iran's support of their homeland's regime.

Wednesday marked Ahmadinejad's last address to the General Assembly as Iranian president. He will end his second four-year term next summer. Presidential elections are scheduled for June.

At a dinner to more than 150 academics and students on Monday, Ahmadinejad said Iran was ready to make concessions on its nuclear drive, but insisted that it had a legal right to enrich uranium and intended to keep on using that right.

Ahmadinejad also criticized international atomic regulators for what he called "double-standards" regarding Iranian and Israeli nuclear programs, and accused Israel of fomenting tension in the Middle East.

The event at the Warwick Hotel, at which Ahmadinejad gave generally lengthy and sometimes evasive answers to questions, was one of several public and media appearances he made ahead of his speech Wednesday to the United Nations General Assembly.

Referring to the Israelis as the "Zionist regime," Ahmadinejad told the dinner, "They want to provoke the situation and give rise to more tensions and get themselves out of a dead end. We are for eradicating the foundations, the reason for these tensions. For a regime to threaten to bomb Iran, this must be condemned by the world."

Harper defends Israel after receiving award

The foundation was created in 1965 as an interfaith "coalition of business and religious leaders" to promote peace, tolerance and ethnic conflict resolution, according to its website.

In his acceptance speech, Harper cautioned that western democracies are facing a time of historic insecurity and that Canada will continue to support and defend Israel, which he said is on the front lines of terrorism and is potentially the first victim of a nuclear-armed Iran.

"Some new powers are neither sure friends nor implacable foes," Harper said. "Other countries, however, constitute unambiguously a clear and present danger and thus demand a very sober assessment. First among these is the government of Iran."

He added: "In supporting Israel, we don't sanction every policy its government pursues. When, however, it is the one country of the global community whose very existence is threatened, our government does refuse to use international fora to single out Israel for criticism."

"And it is important to state, that whatever Israel's shortcomings, neither its existence nor its policies are responsible for the pathologies present in that part of the world."

"And we are also mindful of a lesson of history, that those who single out the Jewish people as a target of racial and religious bigotry will inevitably be a threat to all of us."

"Indeed, those who so target Israel today are, by their own words and deeds, also a threat to all free and democratic societies."

His remarks came a day after Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad addressed the General Assembly and just hours after Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas spoke to the UN.

Both leaders took the opportunity to lambaste Israel in their speeches.

Harper met with Abbas earlier in the day to discuss the Middle East peace process and the situations in Syria and Iran.

But he avoided the UN gathering in favour of attending the foundation gala. Foreign Minister John Baird was scheduled to give Canada's address to the international body on Oct. 1.

Both the NDP and Liberal parties criticized Harper for not appearing at the UN.

Speaking to the National Post last week, Paul Dewar, the NDP's foreign affairs critic, chastised the prime minister for treating the UN as "something that is more of an irritant, frankly, than a constructive place for finding solutions to very complicated problems."

Meanwhile, interim Liberal leader Bob Rae told the Post, that Harper had "missed an opportunity to express himself clearly... as leaders from around the world have done. I think the message is that Canada, that the Harper government doesn't care about the United Nations."

Heirs of Holocaust victims eligible for unclaimed assets

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

A public Israeli organization that holds US$300 million in more than 60,000 unclaimed assets in Israel accumulated by Jews who perished in the Holocaust has launched a campaign in North America to find their rightful heirs.

The Company for the Location and Restitution of Holocaust Victims' Assets in Israel, based in Tel Aviv and known as Hashava, is reaching out to Jews in Canada and the United States in a bid to settle the issue once and for all.

"We hope to find as many heirs as possible," said Elinor Kroitoru, Hashava's chief operating officer, in an interview.

To date, more than 3,000 claims have been recognized, and $20 million has been paid out to heirs. The assets, consisting of real estate, stocks, bonds and funds in bank accounts, were bought by European Jews on visits to Palestine.

Many of the investors, having returned to their homes in Europe, were murdered or died during World War II.

Israel's parliament, the Knesset, passed legislation in 2006 to establish Hashava, a non-profit entity that supports Holocaust survivors in Israel.

The assets consist of 599 buildings, apartments, plots and sub-divided plots, $70 million worth of accounts in Israeli banks, 25,000 shares in the Jewish Colonial Trust (a financial institution of the Zionist Organization) and the contents of safe deposit boxes.

Asked how Hashava determines the eligibility of heirs, Kroitoru said, "At first, we verify that the applicant's family member and the owner of the asset are the same person. When a match is found, we examine the applicant's relation to the asset owner and their rights of inheritance."

In some cases, she added, an applicant must obtain an inheritance decree from an Israeli court.

"We do our best to assist the applicant in obtaining the historical documents needed and to research their family tree."

Applicants should go to Hashava's free online database, www.hashava.info, to ascertain whether they are rightful heirs.

The process is said to be fast and simple.

Canadian-Israeli gets three month sentence

Philip Podolsky and Gabe Fisher
The Times of Israel

The Jaffa Military Court sentenced Yana Gorelik, the 30-year old Canadian-Israeli who was imprisoned for dodging the IDF draft, to three months in prison Sept. 27.

The sentence was the result of a plea bargain between the IDF and Gorelik. According to the terms of the agreement, the month of incarceration served by Gorelik ahead of the trial is to be deducted from the sentence.

Following confirmation of the arrangement, Gorelik's lawyer, Benny Koznitz, said the defence was "pleased to see the end of it."

Gorelik, a massage therapist who currently lives in London with her fiancé, moved from Israel to Canada with her family at age 17 and had visited Israel several times over the last two years without a problem. On Sept. 2, she entered Israel to attend a family wedding, but was detained at Ben-Gurion Airport as a deserter from the IDF.

Gorelik said the authorities treated her like "a delinquent, and threw me in jail with other girls. They treated us like we were dogs. That's it, I am finished with Israel. I don't want to be a citizen anymore."

In response, the IDF said that "Gorelik did not complete her exemption from military service in 2007 as requested by the IDF," stating that the failure to do so was legally considered desertion. All children born in Israel who live in Israel until the age of 15 are required to serve in the military unless they receive an official exemption. Those who reside abroad can complete an exemption process at their local embassies.

The army said that Gorelik had been incarcerated, served an indictment and judged like any other army deserter.

Gorelik maintains that the Israeli consulates in both Canada and London had told her that because of her age as displayed on her new passport, she did not need to file for an official exemption.

She was released for Rosh Hashanah, which she reportedly spend at the home of an aunt in Bat Yam.

Gorelik's family, who still live in the Toronto area, said she visited Israel in 2010 and 2011 without incident. But on arriving in Israel on Sept. 2 with her fiancé, Israeli authorities told her to report to an army base the next day to sign paperwork and settle her affairs with the military. At the base she was arrested and brought to prison in central Israel, the Toronto Star reported.

The Israeli army claims that after Gorelik received her draft order when she was 17, she was legally obligated to report for two years of military service, which is standard for women without exemptions.

"She left Israel without trying to initiate any process to get out of it," an IDF spokesman told the Star.

Gorelik's family said she attempted to settle her affairs with the IDF in 2007. The IDF said there was information on file showing Gorelik visited Israel that year, but did not elaborate to the Star.

Last May, Israeli military police began an operation to arrest thousands of army deserters and draft dodgers, including several foreigners, the Star reported.

Dean of Jewish Life and Learning

Moriah College is an independent, co-educational, Jewish school based in Sydney, Australia. The College was founded in 1943 and is considered one of the leading Jewish day schools in the world with an enrolment of approximately 1760 students from Preschool to Year 12.

The Primary, Middle and High Schools of the College are located at a modern, purpose-built campus in Sydney's Eastern Suburbs. Moriah has a history of developing students with a strong Jewish identity and consistently ranks academically amongst the top schools in New South Wales. The College is proud and protective of its Modern Orthodox Zionist ethos.

The College is seeking to appoint a Dean of Jewish Life and Learning (Dean) to promote an environment of excellence in formal and informal Jewish education, by enhancing and implementing a strategic and holistic plan, from Preschool to Year 12. As a senior member of the College Executive, the Dean will lead the College on all matters pertaining to its ethos. He or she will also lead the Jewish Life and Learning Management Team, as well as approximately 55 staff that provide those programs.

The ideal candidate will be an accomplished and dynamic Jewish educator with a strong intellect, who will command the respect of the Moriah community. He or she will display unquestionable commitment to the ethos of the College, and an ability to apply it in an inclusive manner.

To obtain a role specification, applicants should contact Darren Challis, the consultant advising the Board. Email: darren@challis.com.au or on +61 408 623 312. Applications close 19 October 2012.

No remorse for killing

Hagai Amir, a co-conspirator in the 1995 murder of Yitzhak Rabin, has said that in hindsight he would have helped to assassinate the late Israeli prime minister at an earlier date. Hagai Amir, the brother of Rabin assassin Yigal Amir, wrote on his Facebook page that he and his brother would have killed Rabin "two years earlier" if they could do it over and that he was "most definitely proud" of his actions. Hagai Amir was released from prison in May. His brother is still in jail for gunning down Rabin on Nov. 4, 1995, in Tel Aviv. The Amirs opposed Rabin's territorial concessions, a condition of the Oslo accords.

Pullout needed: Barak

Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak proposed in a newspaper interview that Israel unilaterally withdraw from outlying West Bank settlements and outposts. Under the plan that Barak outlined in a pre-Yom Kippur interview with Israel

Hayom, any Jewish settlers who want to remain in their West Bank homes after the withdrawal could do so under Palestinian rule. Israel Hayom reported on the interview Sept. 24, saying that under Barak's plan, the blocs of Gush Etzion, Ma'aleh Adumim and Ariel, representing 90 per cent of the Jews living in the West Bank, would remain under Israeli control and protected by the Israeli military. Dozens of small Jewish communities would have to be evacuated under the plan, according to Israel Hayom. The newspaper reported that Barak proposes several options for the Jewish settlers that would be evacuated under the plan: to provide them with compensation; to move the entire community to another community in one of the settlement blocs or inside the 1967 borders, and to allow them to remain in their homes under Palestinian rule for a five-year trial period.

Netanyahu's speech directed at American voters

Haviv Rettig Gur
The Times of Israel

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu drew a torrent of ridicule Sept. 27 when he unveiled before the General Assembly of the United Nations a cartoon bomb and drew a red line on it with a marker he pulled from his pocket.

It was a gimmick that ignited a wave of scorn and Looney Tunes jokes on social media sites.

Even some supporters of Israel, such as American journalist Jeffrey Goldberg, bemoaned Netanyahu's use of the cartoon. On Twitter, he wrote, "OK, it's official. Netanyahu has no idea what he's doing. He has just turned a serious issue into a joke."

But the image of the Israeli prime minister drawing with a bright red marker before the assembled delegates of the General Assembly – the very scene mocked and belittled by pundits, observers and activists – was not meant for the delegates in the hall, nor the journalists on Twitter.

Netanyahu's speech was not even meant for U.S. President Barack Obama, who may ultimately decide the fate of the Iranian nuclear program. Instead, Netanyahu was speaking over Obama's head, directly to the president's employer and boss: the American voter.

In the wake of his open disagreement with Obama in recent weeks over the timeline for stopping the Iranian nuclear program, Netanyahu has been accused – not least by leading Democratic members of the House of Representatives – of inserting himself into the American presidential election on the side of Republican challenger Mitt Romney.

Netanyahu has argued that the timing for his public calls for an American "red line" on Iran is unconnected to the U.S. "electoral calendar," but rather is driven by the Iranian "nuclear calendar." Iran, he argued before the General Assembly, will be able to build a nuclear weapon by next year.

But it was hard on Sept. 27 to listen to Netanyahu's speech – delivered in English, couched in simple language full of references to the Bible and Jewish history, and accompanied by what may be the most childish prop ever brought into the Assembly debate – and not regard his words as intended for American popular consumption.

In fact, in making the case that Iran's regime is dangerous – too dangerous to be trusted with nuclear weapons – some of the examples offered by Netanyahu clearly pointed to his intended audience.

"Just look at what the Iranian regime has done up till now, without nuclear weapons..."

They abetted the killing of American soldiers in Iraq and continue to do so in Afghanistan. Before that, Iranian proxies killed hundreds of American troops in Beirut and in Saudi Arabia... In the last year, they've spread their international terror networks to two dozen countries across five continents – from India and Thailand to Kenya and Bulgaria. They've even plotted to blow up a restaurant a few blocks from the White House in order to kill a diplomat."

A rumour among journalists suggested – though no source could confirm on Sept. 27 – that Netanyahu was asked by the American administration to thank Obama for his own rhetoric on Iran in his speech Sept. 25. It is, after all, campaign season. If the rumour is true, Netanyahu disappointed, giving no ground to indicate he saw eye-to-eye with the U.S. president.

"Two days ago, from this podium, Obama reiterated that the threat of a nuclear-armed Iran cannot be contained," he began. And while he noted, "I very much appreciate the president's position, as does everyone in my country," he would only add that "Israel is in discussions with the United States over this issue, and I am confident that we can chart a path forward together."

In fact, he offered a hinted admonishment, explaining to the American president, "What I have said today will help ensure that this common goal is achieved."

In simple language, Netanyahu then laid out a beginner's explanation of his position.

"Basically, any bomb consists of explosive material and a mechanism to ignite it. The simplest example is gunpowder and a fuse. That is, you light the fuse and set off the gunpowder," he taught.

"In the case of Iran's plans to build a nuclear weapon, the gunpowder is enriched uranium. The fuse is a nuclear detonator. For Iran, amassing enough enriched uranium is far more difficult than producing the nuclear fuse." Since for Iran it "takes many, many years to enrich uranium for a bomb," and the enrichment must take place "in very big industrial plants," during the enrichment phase, Iran's program is "vulnerable."

However, if Iran completes enrichment and is left with only a detonator to build – a device that can be manufactured "in a small workshop the size of a classroom" in a country "bigger than France, Germany, Italy and Britain combined" – it will be impossible to locate and destroy the program at that point.

"The relevant question is not when Iran will get the bomb. The relevant question is at what stage can we no longer stop Iran from getting the bomb," Netanyahu concluded. Timesofisrael.com

Abbas foreshadows coming legal campaign

Haviv Rettig Gur
The Times of Israel

In the initial responses to Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' address to the UN General Assembly last Thursday, most pundits zeroed in on language dealing with the possibility of rekindling negotiations with Israel.

But Abbas did not take the UN podium – to general applause that interrupted his speech several times – in order to return to negotiations. Rather, he used his speech before the United Nations to offer a condemnation of Israel and Israeli policies that sounded more like a legal brief before the International Criminal Court (ICC) than a diplomatic address or negotiating position.

And that's no accident.

Israel, Abbas said, is an international law-breaker that is "permitted to evade accountability and punishment" despite "its violations of international law and covenants."

This lax enforcement of international law "represents a licence for the occupation to continue its policy of dispossession and ethnic cleansing, and encourages it to entrench its system of apartheid against the Palestinian people."

Abbas described Israel's "illegal" policies in language taken directly from the texts and discourse of international law. The "occupying power" – a legal term repeated multiple times in the speech – has employed severe "illegal measures" against the Palestinian population, including hindering economic development and pursuing a policy of "racist settlement."

In addition to "inciting religious conflict," Israel "refuses to end the occupation and refuses to allow the Palestinian people to attain their rights and freedom and rejects the independence of the state of Palestine."

In stark contrast, the Palestinians were presented in Abbas' speech as patient and, above all, law-abiding, "a people that feels that, at the same time that they continue with their calls for their right to freedom and their adoption of a culture of peace and adherence to the principles and rules of international law and resolutions of international legitimacy, rewards continue to be illogically bestowed upon Israel, whose government pursues a policy of war, occupation and settlement colonization."

The international community must "compel the government of Israel to respect the Geneva Conventions," he insisted.

In April, the ICC, under then-prosecutor Luis Moreno Ocampo, ruled that the PA did not fall under its jurisdiction as it was not a recognized state that could make itself party to the Rome Statute that established the court. However, according to the ICC's new prosecutor, Gambian-born Fatou Bensouda, the ICC's rejection was not permanent.

"What we have also done [in the April decision] is to leave the door open, and to say that if Palestine is able to pass over that hurdle [of statehood] – of course, under the [UN] General Assembly – then we will revisit what the ICC can do," Bensouda said Friday in an event at the Council on Foreign Relations in Washington.

Indeed, she suggested that the ICC would not need to wait for another Palestinian request to begin investigating Israel. The original 2009 PA request to join the Rome Statute is enough to give the ICC jurisdiction to investigate the Israeli-Palestinian conflict at its discretion.

"Palestine made a declaration under the [Rome] Statute acknowledging the jurisdiction of the court. As you know, this is one of the ways in which we can have jurisdiction to investigate and prosecute," Bensouda said.

The ICC has focused its investigations largely on leaders and crimes committed in Africa in recent years, leading to pressure from some quarters – including African leaders – to show that it isn't prejudiced against Africa. The ICC, some observers believe, is under pressure to broaden its investigative agenda beyond the African continent.

With the Palestinians insistent on bringing the Israeli-Palestinian conflict before the ICC, a sympathetic General Assembly that rose to its feet for a standing ovation as Abbas left the podium Thursday, and an ICC with more than a passing interest in expanding its scope of investigation to new regions and issues, Abbas' speech should be taken as a sign of things to come.

Commenting on Abbas' speech, Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, said in a release, "We are disappointed that Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas continues to avoid direct negotiations with Israel, and has instead chosen to use the UN as a platform for symbolic gestures that will create neither peace nor a Palestinian state." Timesofisrael.com

In Scandinavia, kippah becomes a symbol of defiance

Cnaan Liphshiz
JTA

MALMO, Sweden — Across Scandinavia, the kippah is becoming a symbol of Jewish defiance.

On Sept. 23, about 70 Danish Jews took a double-decker bus from Copenhagen on a 10-mile bridge across the Strait of Öresund, on the Baltic Sea, to go to Malmö in a show of solidarity with the embattled Jews of that Swedish city. All the men on the bus wore kippot, a rarity in Scandinavia.

Last December, a small group of Malmö Jews violated security protocol by keeping on their kippot on the street after attending synagogue, according to Fredrik Sieradski, a spokesman for Malmö's 700 or so Jews, and then made a regular habit of it every few weeks. New marchers join every time.

In August, hundreds of people from across Sweden went on public "kippah walks" in Malmö and Stockholm.

It's not just in Scandinavia. In early September, a flash mob wearing kippot gathered in Berlin after a rabbi and his 6-year-old daughter were attacked. The yarmulke-clad crowd included not just Jews but Christians, Muslims, local celebrities and politicians.

But in Scandinavia, where the Jewish communities of Denmark, Sweden and Norway are relatively tiny and used to keeping a low profile, the shift to public demonstrations against antisemitism marks a turning point. Sunday's bus trip marked the first time that Scandinavian Jews from another country had come to Malmö to express solidarity. Malmö, Sweden's third-largest city and the site of some of the country's highest profile attacks on Jews, has been a focal point for the demonstrations.

"The community here used to keep a low profile, but there's a feeling that we are lost if we do nothing now," Sieradski told JTA.

He attributed the change in Malmö to "a slow build-up" of frustration since 2009, when Israel's war with Hamas in Gaza sparked anti-Israel and antisemitic demonstrations in the city, leaving Jews with the feeling that they were under threat and without sufficient protection from the authorities.

"This build-up has finally reached a critical mass," Sieradski said.

The need for Jewish response became impossible to ignore in 2009, community leaders say, when Israeli tennis players showed up to compete in the Davis Cup, which Malmö was hosting. Anti-Israel demonstrations erupted and quickly morphed into violent, antisemitic riots.

Some 50 to 100 antisemitic incidents occur here annually, according to police and community statistics. Many of the perpetrators are first- and second-generation Muslim immigrants, who make up 30 to 40 per cent of Malmö's population of 300,000. Sieradski said that wearing a kippah in Malmö can lead to insults, harassment and vandalism.

Rabbi Sheneur Kesselman, a Chabad envoy to Malmö, has been targeted many times since coming here in 2004. Last week, someone carved the word "Palestina" into his new car.

"I had no idea it would be like this before I came here, and I probably wouldn't have come had I known," said Rabbi Kesselman, who has four children. "But it would be very bad for the community if I left."

Making matters worse, Malmö Mayor Ilmar Reepalu has advised Jews who want to be safe in Malmö to reject Zionism. Though he has condemned antisemitism, Jews recently rallied in Sweden.

Reepalu has called Zionism a form of "extremism" comparable with antisemitism, said the Jewish community had been "infiltrated" by anti-Muslim agents and denied that Muslims perpetrated the attacks on Malmö Jews.

During her visit to the country in June, Hannah Rosenthal, the Obama administration's special envoy for combating antisemitism, said that Reepalu had made "antisemitic statements." Malmö under Reepalu, she said, is a "prime example" of "new antisemitism," where anti-Israel sentiment serves as a thin guise for Jew-hatred.

Reepalu's unsympathetic stance has been among the key factors that have galvanized Scandinavia's Jews. Aboard the bus on Sept. 23 from Copenhagen to Malmö, the mayor was a subject of frequent condemnation.

Finn Rudaizky, a Copenhagen alderman and former leader of Denmark's Jewish community, said he felt there was "a Jewish duty" to show the Malmö community it was not alone.

No injuries in Malmö bombing

Yoel Goldman
The Times of Israel

MALMO, Sweden — An explosive device detonated in front of a Jewish community centre in Malmö, Sweden, early on Sept. 28. There were no injuries reported.

The blast blew out some windows and caused damage to the front door of the building. The explosion was heard several blocks away, according to Swedish media outlet Varlden Idag.

Two suspects were arrested following the explosion, but initial reports did not reveal their identities or any possible motives.

Malmö, home to approximately 700 Jews, is Sweden's third-largest city and the site of some of the country's highest profile attacks on Jews in recent years.

Frustration has been building in Malmö since 2009, when Israel's war with Hamas in Gaza sparked anti-Israel and antisemitic demonstrations in the city, leaving Jews with the feeling that they were under threat and without sufficient protection from the authorities.

When Israeli tennis players showed up that year to compete in the Davis Cup, which Malmö was hosting, anti-Israel protests erupted and quickly morphed into violent, antisemitic riots.

Police and community statistics estimate some 50 to 100 antisemitic incidents occur in the city annually. Many of the perpetrators are first- and second-generation Muslim immigrants, who make up 30 to 40 per cent of Malmö's population of 300,000.

The Simon Wiesenthal Center told the Times of Israel that it had previously issued a travel advisory for Jews thinking of visiting Malmö. Representatives of the Jewish human rights organization recently traveled to the city and confronted the mayor and police over their refusal to properly protect the local rabbi and Jewish community from harassment.

Book explores Tel Aviv's status as national symbol

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Far from being just another teeming city in the Middle East, Tel Aviv, the first Hebrew metropolis established in almost two millennia, is a vibrant national symbol, the fulfilment of the modern Zionist dream.

Despite its historic, economic and cultural importance, Tel Aviv – Israel's global city and a redoubt of its liberal and enlightened values – has been a rather neglected topic in scholarship on Israel.

The reasons are clear. Jerusalem's claim on the Israeli and Jewish imagination remains indisputable and even irresistible. The kibbutz, until very recently at least, served as a compelling metaphor for Israeli statehood.

Maaz Azaryahu and S. Ilan Troen, the editors of Tel Aviv: The First Century: Visions, Designs, Actualities (Indiana University Press), believe that Tel Aviv deserves much more recognition than it has garnered. And in this volume of thoughtful essays by Israeli scholars, Tel Aviv takes its rightful place in the pantheon of Israeli studies.

The editors know their stuff.

Azaryahu, a professor of cultural geography at Haifa University, is the author of Tel Aviv: Mythography of a City. Troen is the director of the Shusterman Center for Israeli Studies at Brandeis University.

Described by essayist Yaacov Shavit as the first Jewish city since Caesarea, Tel Aviv was founded in 1909 as a garden suburb of Jaffa, a predominantly Arab town. Originally known as Ahuzat Bayit, Tel Aviv took shape from the 1920s onward, growing in accordance with a master plan devised by Scottish city designer Patrick Geddes (1854-1932).

Geddes, the planner of the Hebrew University, envisaged Tel Aviv as a city of the future. It was a concept eagerly embraced by Zionist pioneers.

One of the founders of Tel Aviv, Akiva

Arieh Weiss, foresaw the day when it would have streets, sidewalks, electric lights and sewerage pipes.

Meir Dizengoff, Tel Aviv's first mayor, declared, "We are conducting the most important experiment in the entire period of our exile." Striking something of a messianic note, he said that its residents were fulfilling a "daring dream to build on sands of wilderness, on desolate seashore, an eternal edifice, a shelter for the spirit and vigor of the Jew... in the time of our new revival and redemption."

The founders of Tel Aviv were driven by overlapping motivations, says Troen in his essay. Severe overcrowding in Jaffa, as well as a desire by some of its Jewish inhabitants to improve their living conditions, prompted them to invest in the construction of a brand new city facing the azure waters of the Mediterranean Sea.

But as Deborah Bernstein points out, Jews from Jaffa had already moved to spanking new all-Jewish suburbs – Neve Tzedek, Neve Shalom and Kerem Hatemanim – long before Ahuzat Bayit became a reality.

Nahum Karlinsky suggests that Tel Aviv developed its own identity thanks to the British Mandate. "While the Ottomans had adamantly insisted that Tel Aviv be subordinated to Jaffa, the British... quickly helped Tel Aviv to become legally and administratively separate from Jaffa."

Granted city status in 1934, Tel Aviv experienced a building boom during the rest of the decade as German Jewish refugees poured in. Azaryahu writes that this influx had a profound impact. "New streets, buildings, coffee shops, factories and cars lent the city the appearance of a bustling metropolis." The presence of German Jews underscored Tel Aviv's status as a heterogeneous city, Bernstein observes. As she puts it, "Its Jewish inhabitants differed among themselves in their origin, class, language and culture, family structure [and] accommodation."

Tel Aviv's seashore in the 1950s, with Jaffa at the top of the photograph.

In spite of their differences, the Jews of Tel Aviv shared the common goal of making Hebrew the lingua franca of the city. Only 43 per cent of its residents spoke Hebrew in 1914, says Zohar Shavit. But by 1928, the figure had risen to 60 per cent.

Like all cities, Tel Aviv was tarnished by blemishes. Its hot and humid summer climate was an ideal breeding ground for the anopheles mosquito, the carrier of malaria. And as Tel Aviv grew, still more problems, from high population density to heavily polluted air, came to the fore, as Yoram Bar-Gal states.

But these irritants paled in comparison to the hardships endured by the dwellers of Tel Aviv, who were expelled by the Ottomans during World War I. Anat Helman, in her essay, deals with a problem that foreign tourists invariably encountered when interacting with locals. As she writes, "Visitors from Western countries sometimes viewed the common behavior of Tel Aviv residents as extremely impolite, even downright rude."

Buttressing her argument, Helman quotes the impressions of a Canadian who visited Tel Aviv in 1933. He complained about "the lack of common courtesy displayed by the general public" and about the "sharp business practices" he had the misfortune to witness.

Yet in the eyes of its literary class in the 1920s, Tel Aviv was regarded with a sense of amazement and pride, says Bar-Gal.

And its beaches, now and then, were alluring. Writing in 1938, an observer claimed that the seashore was central to the lives of Tel Aviv residents. It was an urban experience where "bathing in the sea is a special delight" and "suntanned children, impulsive and lively, dart through the gold-tinted blue waves, showering sprays of water."

Although Tel Aviv was essentially a satellite city of Jaffa, surprisingly few of its Jewish residents ever ran into Palestinian Arabs. According to Bernstein, such encounters usually occurred in passing, in cafes and brothels in some "border areas" and in the Carmel Market.

In an essay on Tel Aviv's urban heritage, Nurit Alfasi and Roy Fabian focus on its Bauhaus school of architecture, which diverged from the Oriental style of Old Jaffa.

The Bauhaus structures, popularized by German Jewish architects, aged rapidly due to poor building materials, resulting in the emergence of an ugly and dull city centre. Preservation efforts, however, have reversed this development and have had a gentrifying effect on the city. Many of these graceful Bauhaus buildings can be found on and around Dizengoff Street, Tel Aviv's central thoroughfare and Israel's "main street" in the 1950s, says Azaryahu.

Dizengoff, having lost much of its cachet since then, has been supplanted by Sheinkin Street, Tel Aviv's version of Greenwich Village or Soho.

Whatever its hub may be today, Tel Aviv has blossomed into a world-class city, brimming with elan, excitement and sophistication.

Study With Rabbi Wayne Allen

Six Jewish Philosophers You Probably Never Heard Of... And Why That Should Change

Rabbi Dr. Wayne Allen will make the case for a renewed appreciation for six Jewish philosophers who have lapsed into obscurity but whose teachings warrant reconsideration. In six successive sessions Rabbi Allen will present the teachings of Joseph Albo on what must Jews believe, Nachman Krokhmal on the genius of the Jewish people, Moritz Lazarus on what makes for moral law, Samuel Alexander on the existence of God, Hans Jonas on living in the shadow of the Sho'ah, and Sidney Hook on transformative power of a single person.

How Does Jewish Law Change? An Insider's View

As a noted expert on Jewish law, author of two books in the field and editor of two others, Rabbi Dr. Wayne Allen will demonstrate how Jewish law has remained vital, vibrant, and fluid yet, at the same time, stable and reliable. Over the course of six sessions Rabbi Allen will discuss the influence of custom, the Talmudic equivalent of the "notwithstanding" clause, changing circumstances, and newly emergent principles – among other factors. Drawing on many examples from kashrut to medical ethics, Rabbi Allen will offer important insights into understanding Judaism as a legal system.

Elena Cherney takes the leap from reporter to editor

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Having been appointed managing editor of the Globe and Mail only recently, Elena Cherney is still on a steep learning curve.

"It's like any new job," said Cherney, who assumed her position in the third week of August. "There is a lot to learn."

Previously the editor of the Report on Business, a separate section in the Globe and Mail, she is now in the throes of mastering what she described as "the nuts and bolts" of Canada's self-styled national daily.

Cherney seems equal to the task of producing a quality newspaper – a complex challenge, even though she has spent the bulk of her career in journalism as a reporter.

Now 40, she had her first taste of editing in 2007, when she was the assistant editor of the Globe's Life section. There, she said in an interview in her windowless office on the second floor, she learned the difference between being a reporter and being an editor.

"As an editor, you're bringing together groups of people and figuring out the elements of a story," she explained. "As a reporter, you're much more focused on the story."

To Cherney, a great editor is, above all, a team player working in an intensely collaborative milieu.

She talks regularly with the editor-in-chief, John Stackhouse, who hired her. She consults with section heads at meetings twice a day. And she is in constant contact with reporters, whom she calls "the drivers of the newsroom."

Put plainly, Cherney is a link in a chain rather than an island unto herself.

As she tells it, she was taken aback by Stackhouse's decision to offer her one of the plum positions on staff.

"It was a great surprise," said Cherney, who looks younger than she is. "I was ill-prepared to come to work one day and find myself in a new job."

Elena Cherney

In the days before the Globe released a press release announcing she was its next managing editor, Stackhouse called her into his office and asked whether she would be interested in playing an "enhanced" role.

For Cherney, it was a no-brainer. "I thought it would be a great opportunity."

In an official statement to the newsroom, Stackhouse said he had hired her because she is "a natural leader, an enthusiastic supporter of our journalists with an unbending sense of right and wrong, a believer in people, and an irrepressible champion of Globe journalism."

Born in Victoria, B.C., she was raised in Montreal's Notre-Dame-de-Grâce district, the daughter of Brian (a composer and professor of music and composition at McGill University) and Terri Cherney.

Her brother, David, is a physician at Toronto General Hospital.

A graduate of Montreal's Bialik High School, she later graduated from Yale University, majoring in English and history.

On campus, she wrote for a student publication, the Yale Daily News. "It was a lot of fun and I enjoyed it," she recalled. "I didn't find anything else to do in terms of extra-curricular activities."

Her stint as a reporter whetted her appetite for journalism, but her lifelong interest in current affairs had an impact on her career choice, too.

Cherney's first foray into journalism after university was as a reporter for the Peterborough Examiner, which from 1942 to 1955 was edited by Robertson Davies, who became one of Canada's most prominent novelists.

As a general assignment reporter in Peterborough – her father's family hometown – Cherney had to be versatile. "I did everything. I covered county affairs and took photographs."

After Peterborough, she returned to Montreal as a business and education reporter for the Montreal Gazette. One of the biggest stories she covered was the Quebec referendum.

With four years of experience under her belt, Cherney joined the National Post, Conrad Black's then newly established daily based in Toronto, as a general assignment reporter. She has remarkably little to say about this period.

Her big break occurred when the Wall Street Journal, one of America's greatest dailies, came calling. From 2000 to 2006, she was its Toronto-based correspondent, travelling around Canada to cover companies, banks, the media and general news.

She considers this phase quite important.

"I learned to look for stories that encapsulated change and represented a departure from the norm. I also learned to find the significance of a story and capture its details."

Like all its reporters, Cherney adapted to the Journal's gruelling editorial standards, thereby becoming a better reporter in the process. Much to her satisfaction, some of her stories landed on page one, a memory she still appears to savour.

Three years after leaving the Wall Street Journal, Cherney began editing the Report on Business, which she thinks prepared her for the demands imposed on the managing editor of a major metropolitan daily. "I learned to be a better editor," she said.

But Cherney's six-year stint on the Wall Street Journal may yet prove most influential in terms of her news judgment at the Globe.

"I tend to see news through the lens of its importance to the economy and how Canada will be affected by economic change," she said.

But, as Cherney hastened to add, she realizes that other forces are at work in shaping Canada.

Asked what she envisions her duties at the Globe to be now that she is sitting in the managing editor's chair, she projected quiet self-confidence.

"I try to make sure we're turning out great and original journalism, and I encourage reporters to tell compelling stories that our readers cannot find anywhere else."

The mother of two pre-adolescent children, Cherney makes a point of accompanying Jacob, 10, and Sophie, 7, to school each morning before she arrives at the Globe around 9 a.m.

But long before she sits down at her desk, she has been searching the Internet to get a sense of what is happening in Canada and the world on that day.

At 10 a.m., she reviews unfolding stories with editors, and at 5 p.m., they take stock. "We decide what's coming home to roost, what's working and not working, and what holes in the paper need to be filled."

She added, "I could easily be here until 8 p.m., but I try to leave earlier."

She paused, glancing at her computer. "In the age of BlackBerry, you never really leave your office."

PLANNING FOR RETIREMENT?

L'Shana Tova!

A New Year and a Time of Thanksgiving

Recently we took the time to reflect on the past year and anticipate the coming year. Very soon we will also give thanks for the abundance we enjoy in our lives – not only for the material necessities and all of the niceties, but also for the good times we spend with family, friends and colleagues who enrich us. We need to be especially thankful if we are also able to appreciate all that we have without worry, because we have established a financial plan that we will leave loved ones debt-free, maintaining their lifestyle; that will protect us if we become disabled through illness or injury; and that allows us to look forward to a long and healthy retirement with enough income to maintain our own lifestyles; and do all of this while paying as little in taxes as is legally possible.

That is also called "Peace of Mind" and that is what we have been providing for over 46 years!

Rapper's lyrics reflect his maturity

David Silverberg
Special to The CJN

Andy Bernstein knows what it's like to be an outsider. He was the only Jewish kid in his high school class when he grew up in the Greektown area of downtown Toronto. When he started writing and performing hip hop, Bernstein was one of the few Jewish white rappers in Canada, if not North America.

Now Bernstein, 38, is embracing the rebel-with-a-cause role as he prepares to release his first hip-hop album without any beats or DJ accompaniment. Instead, Sitting Music features Abdominal – Bernstein's rap moniker – and the Obliques, a guitarist-percussionist duo providing a more traditional musical layer to the rhymes.

Going acoustic is an about-face for a rapper who's played shows across Canada and the United Kingdom with a hip-hop DJ. His past two albums were also heavy on traditional hip-hop beats, but now he's stripping it down to the basics.

"What always drew me to hip hop were the lyrics," Bernstein says in an interview on a sunny Saturday afternoon on College Street. "I want the lyrics to be heard by the audience... and I always try to write lyrics people wouldn't consider disposable."

Sitting Music does indeed stress the words rather than the backing music; Bernstein's lyrics resonate clearly, the music never muffling the lines. Most tunes slip in a jazzy and chill vibe over top Bernstein's raps.

His subject matter also reflects the maturity of an artist who's uninterested in rapping about money, women and self-congratulations. Instead, Bernstein will write one rap about his family – guest-starring his mom actually rapping – and then another about a harsh breakup.

Abdominal doesn't want to be disposable.

"I'm not 20 years old anymore. I've gone through some life experience, and I wanted to be open to being vulnerable and introspective," Bernstein says.

Then again, Bernstein can be playful, evidenced by his ode to chicken wings on Sitting Music. His fans shouldn't be too surprised, since on previous albums he's written about being a bike courier, open relationships and why people should heed the walk-left, stand-right rule on escalators.

Beyond Sitting Music's release, Bernstein is busy making a living "being behind a microphone," as he describes it. He hosts a dance party at Supermarket in Kensington Market on Saturday nights, and also co-hosts Hip-Hop Karaoke, a popular monthly show at the Toronto club Revival that allows any rap lover to take the stage to perform songs in a karaoke format. "I've hosted one bar mitzvah, too," Bernstein says, smiling.

Bernstein also ventured into a literary opportunity: he's worked on Book Tunes, a hip-hop summary of well-known books, such as The Scarlet Letter and Sonja Lyubomirsky's The How of Happiness. Bernstein calls them a musical Coles Notes, allowing students to better retain the plots and themes of a given book. "It can be challenging to sum up 600 pages into one hip-hop song," Bernstein admits, "and yeah, would love to do some CanCon sometime, maybe Margaret Atwood or Richler down the road."

Bernstein gives credit to his parents for encouraging him to pursue a life of music. It helps when your dad is a pun master and your mom is an English teacher/librarian. "They let me do what makes me happy, not pressuring to find a typical nine-to-five career." He pauses. "Well, maybe a little bit of pressure, it wouldn't be a Jewish family without that."

Glaciers, geysers and a genius's grave

Ron Csillag
Special to The CJN

REYKJAVIK — Iceland deserves an award for truth in advertising. As its tourism industry avers, this is the only place on Earth where you can see glaciers, volcanoes and geysers on the same afternoon.

I threw in an added, if somewhat morbid attraction: Bobby Fischer's grave.

Arguably the great chess player ever, Fischer put this Nordic nation on the map in 1972 when he, the fresh-faced American upstart, defeated the world champion, the icy, robotic Soviet, Boris Spassky.

It was billed as the Match of the Century and a decisive Cold War battle between two superpowers. The match attracted more attention than any chess event in history. Chess would never be the same.

Marking the 40th anniversary of the contest is an exhibit at the National Museum of Iceland that consists of the table, board and chairs used by the combatants, their scorecards, the actual chess pieces and other memorabilia.

In this chess-mad country, Fischer is still a hero, though a tragic one. He fell out of public view after the 1972 match, forfeited his title three years later for failing to defend it, and surfaced in 1992 when he played Spassky again in a 20th anniversary "re-match," a rather sad affair between two aging champions (but which Fischer won).

Trouble was, the match took place in the former Yugoslavia, which was then under a United Nations embargo that Fischer violated. The United States was also chasing him for back taxes, and Fischer became a fugitive. He bounced from Hungary to the Philippines and Japan before Iceland granted him full citizenship and took him in.

Mangy-looking and bloated, Fischer was a mess. He saw conspiracies everywhere. The CIA was out to get him, he whispered. The U.S., he announced, fully descended 9/11.

And centrally, the Jewish-born Fischer became a vituperative antisemite. He believed Jews were behind every ill in history. They were villainous "snakes." Tolerant Icelanders lowered their eyes.

He refused treatment and spent his last days mostly alone at a favoured Reykjavik cafe or strolling in the rugged countryside. Fischer died in the capital in early 2008.

Checkmate in Iceland

His funeral was described by a British newspaper as "a guerrilla burial." It took place at the small churchyard cemetery about 60 kilometers southeast of Reykjavik, in the dead of night, attended by five people and performed by a Roman Catholic priest.

And Fischer wasn't done: In 2010, his remains were exhumed to determine whether he was the father of a nine-year-old Filipino girl (he wasn't).

I relate all this to our guide, the strapping Asgeirsson, who smiles and nods, remembering it well. When I rue that Fischer's grave is inconveniently located, Asgeir replies, "not really. Everything in Iceland is close. Do you want to see it?"

Ron Cillag at the grave of arguably the greatest chess player ever.

Within minutes, we are in the town of Selfoss, where Asgeirsson veers off the road and, guessing, turns into the parking lot of Laugardalur Lutheran Church. He walks to the very first tombstone he sees, and there it is: "Robert James Fischer," adorned with a cross.

My emotions are conflicted. What a miserable Jew-hater but a genius who made me appreciate chess so much.

Not to give everything else in Iceland short shrift, but there's lots to do here and you can do most of it in a week. Must-sees include the Golden Circle, which encompasses the roaring Gullfoss waterfall; the Strokkur geyser, which erupts every few minutes; and the pristine Thingvellir National Park, where Vikings established the world's first democratic parliament in 930 CE.

The famous Blue Lagoon, a sparkling salt-water spa the size of a small lake, handles crowds well. Be sure to smear on the mud, which is snow-white.

The Thorsmork Glacier Valley, which can be seen only via 4x4 Jeep, will have you believe you're on the surface of the moon. And Iceland's newest attraction is the "Inside the Volcano" tour, which lowers tourists on a scaffold into the dormant chamber of Thrihnukagigur, a volcanic peak just outside Reykjavik. It's been 4,000 years since it blew its top but evidence of the once-fiery abyss surrounds you with vivid colours.

But back to Fischer: The eyes of chess nerds and purists glaze over when they relate his age at death. He was 64 — the number of squares on a chess board.

Documentaries highlight struggle for worker's rights

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

The Jewish Film Society is presenting two documentaries on Oct. 14 that highlight the struggle of American Jewish immigrants to improve their lives.

At Home in Utopia, by Michael Goldman, focuses on efforts by Jewish garment workers in New York City to build and operate a co-operatively owned apartment building in the Bronx.

Triangle: Remembering the Fire, by Daphne Pinkerson, recalls the catastrophic blaze in Manhattan in 1911 that killed 146 women, many of whom were recent arrivals from eastern Europe, in a garment factory.

Both documentaries are strong and emphatic.

At Home in Utopia takes us back to the 1920s, when 700 Jewish families pooled their resources to build the United Workers Co-operative Colony, popularly known as the "Coops." They banded together to build a "heaven on earth" at a time when the co-operative movement was at its height in the United States.

The "Coops" gave them everything they had previously lacked: green spaces, gardens, children's play areas and space for recreational activities.

The "Coops" was by no means the only co-operative community in the city. Farband Houses were built by Labor Zionists, while Sholem Aleichem Houses were constructed by Yiddishists. The "Coops," however, was probably the most grassroots and member-driven co-operative of the lot.

The "Coops" gave its members, which mainly consisted of communists, the opportunity to practice utopian ideals in the quest for a just society. They invited African Americans to join their co-operative in an era when racial injustice was rampant and segregation was taken for granted. And, threatened by insolvency as the Depression deepened, they pressed for mortgage relief laws.

The co-operative idea was battered by a number of events, notably the Soviet Union's non-aggression pact with Nazi Germany in 1939, and eventually the "Coops" had to sell out to private interests.

New York policemen watch a fire consuming a Manhattan garment factory in 1911. Corpses of some of the victims lie on the sidewalk.

But as the film suggests, the co-operative concept is still alive and well in the Big Apple.

On March 25, 1911, tragedy struck when a raging fire engulfed a new building housing the Triangle Waist Company, which manufactured shirtwaists for women.

Triangle: Remembering the Fire recounts the disaster that changed the face of labour relations in the United States.

The women who worked in the factory, which was owned by Isaac Harris and Max Blanck, were subjected to brutal working conditions. There was no real regard for workers' safety.

A few months before the fire, garment workers in New York City went on strike, demanding better pay and more humane conditions. Weathering the strike, Harris and Blanck refused to recognize union-certified employees.

When the fire broke out, more than 60 people managed to escape, but workers on the ninth floor were unable to flee. The exit door was shut tight. There were few, if any, fire escapes. Firefighters' ladders could reach only up to the sixth floor.

In desperation, 90 or so frightened women jumped to their deaths, while the remainder of the victims were burned to death.

"This shouldn't have happened," says a descendant of one of the hapless victims.

Grief turned to rage as survivors and their supporters demanded a reckoning. Harris and Blanck were charged with manslaughter, but a smart lawyer got them acquitted.

Nonetheless, the Triangle fire was a turning point, a defining moment, in American history.

As one commentator observes, Franklin Roosevelt's New Deal really started in 1911 as a succession of new laws, and codes were enacted to protect workers from rapacious bosses and the possibility of fire.

In short, the Triangle fire burned a hole in America's conscience and ushered in a new dawn.

Screenings are at 4 p.m. and 7:30 p.m.

NFL Films' Sabol dies at 69

Compiled by CJN Staff

Steve Sabol, the man credited with elevating films about NFL football to near-mythic proportions, died recently of brain cancer at age 69.

Together with his father, Ed, 96, who survives him, Sabol created a style of film that featured slow motion replays, monumental musical backdrops and narrations that gave the Sunday games a gravitas akin to Shakespearean dramas or Greek tragedies.

Sports Illustrated called the films, "perhaps the most effective propaganda organ in the history of corporate America."

The launch of the Sabols' NFL Films corresponded with the sport's rapid growth, beginning in the 1960s.

According to Joe Posnanski, writing in SportsonEarth.com, Ed Sabol was a talented amateur who bid $5,000 – a vast sum at the time – for the rights to film the 1962 NFL championship game. His main experience at the time was filming 14-year-old Steve's high school games.

According to Posnanski, "the energy, the creative madness, the football fascination, the artist's flair, the obsessive focus... came from [Steve]."

Sabol's first script for They Call it Pro Football opened with the line, "It starts with a whistle and ends with a gun." That film, and many subsequent ones, was narrated by John Facenda, a former Philadelphia TV news anchor who possessed "the voice of God" according to some critics.

Steve Sabol is credited with numerous innovations in producing game films. He used film, not tape, for greater resolution and tone. He employed many cameras to be sure all perspectives were recorded and used a hand-held camera to roam the sideline to capture unusual images. He often shot in slow motion.

As a college player at Colorado College he produced advertisements for himself in newspapers, postcards, brochures, T-shirts, lapel buttons and pencils to persuade his coach to let him play, according to the New York Times. He went on to be an all-conference fullback and team captain.

He described himself as the "Prince of Pigskin Pageantry now at the Pinnacle of his Power," and his scripts continued to use alliteration in NFL films. He gave himself the nickname Sudden Death Sabol, and the New Jersey native claimed to be from Possum Trot, Miss.

Sabol personally received 35 of NFL Film's 107 Emmys for writing, cinematography, editing, directing and producing.

Sabol is survived by his father; his mother, Audrey; his wife, Penny; a sister, Blair; and a son, Casey.

Montreal slo-pitch association holding reunion banquet

Compiled by CJN Staff

MONTREAL — Former players from the Côte Saint-Luc Slo Pitch Association will hold a reunion banquet on Oct. 17 at 6 pm at the Côte Saint-Luc Aquatic and Community Centre, 5794 Parkhaven Ave.

Players who were part of teams in the 1950s, '60s and up to and including 1972, are invited to attend the banquet. The Slo-Pitch Association operated for more than 40 years.

The event is co-chaired by Mish Granik and Roy Salomon, while members of the organizing committee includes Harold Laxer, Ken Saxe and former Cote Saint-Luc city councillor Lionel Segal.

"Roy and I got this idea while working out daily at the Snowdon Y," Granik said. "Unfortunately, we've lost a few of those players, but life does go on for all of us who are much older now. We want to reach out to all the former stars that played in the league when it first began in the park opposite the Beth Zion Congregation before moving to Wentworth Park [now Kirwan Park]."

All former players, executives, officials and umpires are urged to register with Segal at lionelsegal@hotmail.ca or Cammy at hcammmy@cotesaintluc.org. The deadline for registration is Oct. 10.

The fee for an evening of fun, reunion stories and buffet dinner is $30.

Israel fails to qualify for World Baseball Classic

JIA

JUPITER, Fla. — Israel failed to advance to the World Baseball Classic, losing 9-7 to Spain in 10 innings in the final game of the qualifying round.

Spain scored twice in the 10th inning of Sunday night's game and advances to the tournament in March, despite having the same number of losses as Israel in the modified double-elimination tournament.

Some 1,500 Jewish fans packed the stands for the game. Shwarma and falafel were sold alongside the traditional hot dogs, and the organ piped out Hava Nagila when an Israeli came to bat.

Israel had won its first two games of the tournament, defeating South Africa and Spain behind two home runs in each game by Nate Freiman, a standout first baseman for the San Diego Padres' Class AA San Antonio Missions. Spain beat France to make it to the final game against Israel.

Most of the Israeli squad's 28-man roster was comprised of Jewish minor league

ers. Former Major Leaguers Shawn Green and Gabe Kapler also were on the squad, as were three Israeli pitchers – Alon Leichman, Shlomo Lipetz and Dan Rothem.

Former Major League catcher Brad Ausmus was the team's manager.

Marketing Hall of Legends honours Miles Nadal

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

If you walk past the corner of Bloor Street and Spadina Avenue in downtown Toronto, you can't help notice the spruced-up building that bears the name Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre.

An entrepreneur and philanthropist, Miles Nadal was the lead donor in the revitalization of the former Bloor Jewish Community Centre.

When he was a kid growing up, Nadal didn't have much money. He came from modest means, and as a teenager he received a bursary so he could attend the Y, as it then was. As an eight-year-old, he required a subsidy so he could attend summer camp.

Today, of course, it's a different story — he's the man behind MDC Partners, a giant marketing and advertising firm that employs 14,000 people globally and is seventh largest in the world.

The Toronto chapter of the American Marketing Association (AMA) will recognize Nadal's lifelong achievements by inducting him into its Marketing Hall of Legends on Oct. 16.

The Hall of Legends honours Canadians "who have dedicated their lives to the pursuit of excellence in the field of marketing. It is meant to honour a body of work and a lifetime of achievements," states the organization's web page.

"The criteria for selection is based on those Canadians whose ideas and contributions to marketing and brand building have made a tremendous impact in the Canadian and/or global marketplace," the organization states.

MDC Partners is the controlling shareholder of some 60 international marketing firms, including Anomaly, Bruce Mau Design, Capital C, CP+B, Doner, Henderon bas kohn, KBS+ and Veritas.

"MDC companies represent every angle of communications, including advertising, design, interactive, e-commerce, product innovation, experiential marketing and branded entertainment, with a diverse portfolio of clients," the Hall of Legends said.

With a market capitalization of $360 million (US), the company is publicly traded on the NASDAQ exchange. Nadal founded the company and serves as its chair, CEO and president.

MDC has adopted a model of acquiring majority stakes in modest-sized firms that combine an entrepreneurial spirit and a unique position in the marketplace. MDC's partners retain a substantial stake and have an incentive to continue growth.

"If you want to build a team of giants, surround yourself with people better than yourself," Nadal told The C/JN. "We have an extraordinary team and great management information system."

In terms of the companies' size, Nadal prefers smaller, more agile firms. "Scale, multi-national, multi-service, multi-office is a negative," he told the Globe and Mail last year. "A negative for the ability to drive creativity, innovation, and that kind of nimble performance, because scale and innovation are to some degree mutually exclusive."

While MDC has shown tremendous growth over the years, its financial statements also show plenty of red ink and no shortage of debt. Last year, MDC lost $85 million, substantially more than the $15 million it lost in 2010 and the $18 million in 2009. The stock price has reflected that, dropping 12 per cent in the year prior to Sept. 27.

Advertising is far from Nadal's only business interest. His first venture at age 11 was in photography, taking kids' pictures at summer camp. When he was older, he founded Action Photographics and operated it out of an apartment on Shalimar Boulevard in Toronto.

A man in a hurry, he dropped out of business school and at age 21, with $500 charged to his Visa card, started MDC Partners.

"I was a very ambitious guy," he told The C/JN.

His business philosophy always revolved around being "a contrarian," he said. Citing one of several aphorisms in an interview, Nadal said you succeed "when you're greedy when others are fearful and being fearful when others are greedy."

He once told business students to jump at opportunities when they present themselves. Asked by a student how to recognize which opportunity to seize, Nadal quipped, "Just do enough jumping."

In all seriousness, he continued, you have to "foresee outcomes and take steps to increase the probability of a favourable outcome."

In addition to his focus on the marketing space, in 1997 he founded First Asset Management, one of Canada's largest independent asset management firms, with more than $35 billion under management. That company was sold in 2005 to Affiliated Managers Group, a publicly traded U.S. firm.

Nadal's philanthropic activities are perhaps even more extensive than his business ones. Besides supporting the Miles Nadal JCC, he's given substantial sums to the Canada-Israel Park; he's been named Negev Dinner honoree by the Jewish National Fund; he's funded York University's Miles S. Nadal Management Centre; he's supported creation of a young leadership group at Mount Sinai Hospital. He recently returned from Israel where he gave $1 million to support technical innovation and entrepreneurship at Tel Aviv University.

Nadal speaks frequently at business schools on the subject of entrepreneurship. His message to those starting out: "You've got to focus on what you're really good at. Find things you believe in and do things you really love."

Noise-cancellation technology brings peace, quiet

David Shamah
The Times of Israel

TEL AVIV — Ambient noise is one of the banes of modern life.

It's the byproduct of a technologically advanced world where the whirr of computer hard drives, the hum of air conditioners, and the beeps and blips of computers and smart devices combine into a cacophony of background music.

Some people actually like "white noise," as it is sometimes called, and have a hard time functioning when it's too quiet, while the buzz of gadgets drives others crazy. Either way, however, scientists have found that ongoing background noise is clearly linked to increased stress levels and can induce the release of a body chemical called cortisol — too much of which can negatively affect brain functions such as planning, reasoning, impulse control and even short-term memory.

One Israeli company has made it its mission to lower the levels of background noise in our daily lives. Rehovot-based Silentium has a computer algorithm-based silencing technology that can be applied to a wide variety of business and consumer products.

Silentium's system, called Active Noise Control (ANC), is based on producing an "anti-noise" signal that interferes with the original sound wave and cancels out the noise. The system, an advanced form of noise-cancellation technology, is placed within the body of a device. It comprises a sensor microphone that picks up the sound and measures its frequency and amplitude, and a microchip that absorbs the noise input emitted by the noise source and transforms it into output in an inverted phase, thus cancelling it. The ANC can be integrated with an existing product, cutting off the noise at its source and allowing products to operate up to 90 per cent more quietly, according to the company.

Among the company's most recent innovations is an add-on for kitchen-stove hoods, which are used in homes and restaurants to vacuum out odours, smoke and other unwanted byproducts of cooking. The noise level from hoods is sometimes akin to a real vacuum cleaner, and homemakers, and especially workers, who are subject to them often find themselves with a headache at the end of the day.

In a partnership with Italy's Faber, one of the largest manufacturers of kitchen hoods in the world, Silentium developed what officials of both companies believe is the quietest hood in the world. Silentium's ANC technology, built into the hood, reduces the noise level of hoods by 13 decibels and lowers the frequency of the emitted sound, so listeners perceive it as even quieter. The result, said Silentium CEO Yossi Barath, is a hood that makes the sound of rustling paper, instead of the din of exhaust noise that other hoods make.

Silentium produces solutions for some other modern noisemakers, including heating and air-conditioning systems, and computer servers, and for use in server farms, where the noise made by spinning disks, combined with the racket made by the fans and air conditioners needed to keep them cool, produce a mighty din.

The company's basic sound-repression system — called the S-Cube Kit — allows manufacturers to easily integrate Silentium's noise-cancellation technology into their products. It has been used by telecommunications companies such as Huawei and Nokia, IT product makers like Ciara Technologies, and educational institutions, including the Polytechnic University of Madrid.

The company even gets fan mail in the form of testimonials, but Silentium isn't surprised. "Fatigue, stress and hearing impairment are but a few of the symptoms people suffer from excessive noise, significantly affecting quality of life," said Barath. "Silentium's 'silence in a chip' disruptive technology instantly gives manufacturers the ability to design products with a significant competitive edge."

The band Of Gentlemen and Cowards is, from left, Simon Edwards, Jake Warren, Christian Fedele and Josh Dawson.

Cara Stern
Special to The CJN

Two McMaster University students experienced a musician's dream last week.

Jake Warren and Simon Edwards took their band, Of Gentlemen and Cowards, to New York City, where they performed at the Ed Sullivan Theater on the Late Show with David Letterman.

When Edwards got on stage to perform their song, Save Me, he couldn't even think, he said. It was just a matter of regurgitating everything they did at practices. And practise they did.

"We practised Save Me six hours a day for the last week or two before," he said. "We knew exactly what we were going to do, and we knew exactly how we were going to play it."

It all began with a contest: the Red Bull Soundstage Audience Choice competition. Initially, the contest was meant to find songs to play in the background of a new independent movie, We Made This Movie.

Bassist Josh Dawson entered the band into the contest, but didn't expect much, said Edwards, vocalist and guitarist for the band. After about a month, the band had mostly forgotten about the entry, but then they received an email telling them they were one of 23 finalists. Six of them would eventually be chosen for the movie.

"We got the call - they told us we were in it and we didn't react," said Warren, who majors in sociology at McMaster U when he's not playing drums with the band. "We took a second to let it sink in. Then we went from zero to 100 right away."

The celebrations began immediately, with Dawson running around with excitement, Warren recalled. "It was a big sigh of relief and celebration, that all the hard work we did, it worked out. It was a great moment for us."

Next was another contest. Online voters would listen to all the winners and runners-up and vote for who should get to perform on the Late Show with David Letterman. Over a three-week voting period, Of Gentlemen and Cowards collected the most votes and were set to perform on the prestigious program. Warren credited the Jewish communities in Toronto and Hamilton, as well as the Hamilton community as a whole, for the votes.

Edwards said despite the excitement, there was one problem. The show was on Rosh Hashanah, which went against the band's policy of not playing on the holidays so that they can spend time with their families, he said.

Hamilton four-piece rocks the stage on Letterman

However, they knew they couldn't give up this opportunity. Instead, each of their families made the trip to New York City to spend time together.

"They rented a small apartment in Crown Heights, and the five of us [family members] had a real home-cooked meal," Edwards said. "That, to me, was one of the best ways I could have celebrated Rosh Hashanah."

Warren said he was surprised by the way the show is actually produced.

"When you're watching network television, you don't realize how much work goes into this one-hour program," he said. "Like how small the stage is. You walk in, and it's like your living room. The bands look like they have this huge space, but two feet away from us was David Letterman."

Edwards said the band was most excited about watching their performance afterward, wanting to see how they looked as a band on TV.

"It's pretty surreal to watch yourself on network television," he said. "You never think about that, especially as such a young band."

In July, the band told the Hamilton Spectator if they won, they would represent McMaster U to thank Hamiltonian fans for their support. They held true to their word. While they rocked the stage, Edwards showed off a McMaster shirt.

"We wanted people to know that when we were in NYC, we were still thinking of the people back home," Edwards said. "We're still students, we're still Hamiltonians and we're still proud."

All four band members are currently attending McMaster. Edwards studies engineering, while Dawson majors in music, and both Warren and Christian Fedele are sociology majors.

Despite having this taste of fame, academics remain a priority in their lives, Edwards said. "We shut down during exam times because we want to focus on our academics. That's really important to us."

In fact, right after the performance, Warren said they all hurried to catch up on the work they missed while away.

Once they graduate in 2013, they will make a decision on whether to pursue careers in music. Edwards said he expects they will try to make it in the music industry, but they'll feel more comfortable knowing they have degrees.

Both Edwards and Warren credit their Jewish upbringing with sparking their values both academically and musically.

Edwards got his first guitar as a bar mitzvah present from his sisters.

"It was a crappy little green guitar, but I love it," he said. "It's my favourite guitar to date."

He said his sisters were nervous about buying him such an expensive gift because they worried he wouldn't use it. But he quickly fell in love with the instrument, and often spent his spare time learning to play his favourite songs.

Singing also runs in his family. His uncle, David Edwards, is the cantor for Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue in Toronto.

Warren also started playing right after his bar mitzvah, after receiving his first drum kit as a gift.

He said it became boring playing on his own, but once he was in university, he began to jam with some friends.

Now that the Letterman gig is done, the band will head back to school and decide how they will "bounce off of this," Warren said, adding that they recently released a new album, Warmminster, which is available only in vinyl or as a free download from their website.

"We'll keep practising, keep writing music, keep going to classes, and keep writing tests and exams," he said. "It's a lot of work, but I think being on Letterman is motivating us even more than before."

New beginnings

Dear Ella,

I've spent most of my last two years grieving for a wonderful man whom I was married to for 46 years. My family and friends have been supportive, always including me in dinners and events, but it's just not the same. Without fail, on every outing, I am painfully aware of my missing half. We had a good marriage and raised four wonderful children together, but now I'm ready to start something new.

I want to stop feeling like every time I go somewhere, I wish Abe was there, too. After living a long life with someone, there are very few things that don't remind me of him in some way.

Emotionally, I think I'm ready, but I just don't know what to do or where to begin. The last thing I want is to go to a support group for widows and sit around drinking coffee and discussing what I've lost.

I'm a healthy, financially independent, albeit a little scared, 72-year-old woman who is not ready to live the rest of her life in the past. I'm outgoing and still have a lot of energy, but I'm not sure how to move ahead. Sometimes I feel like I have my legs stuck in quicksand.

I don't necessarily want another special man in my life. What I want are friends with whom I can travel, go to a concert or a lecture, discuss a good book, or go out for dinner and a movie without feeling like a third wheel. I know there must be others like me out there. Where do I start?

Not Just a Widow

Dear Not Just a Widow,

You have a great attitude, and that will take you far in your quest. What you're really looking for are a new set of friends, not necessarily to replace the ones you already have, but friends who can enhance your changing lifestyle.

One thing you can be sure of: you're not alone. Active seniors or "zoomers" are in abundance. There's even a radio station catering to your demographic – AM 740.

It's difficult to meet people who are searching for the same things as you unless you find clubs or organizations that cater to what you're looking for. There are many single senior travel groups, exercise groups, walking clubs, card clubs, etc. You can join any of these on an a-la-carte basis.

Try checking out different synagogue groups. Many offer lectures or circles where you can meet new people. Also, the Prosserman JCC has a program called Adults, Zoomers and Beyond. You might also consider doing volunteer work to meet new people.

The Internet is a great resource. Websites such as www.senior.com or www.activeadultmag.com are only two among many. At the very least these sites will give you ideas and you can also connect with others through their forums. Read different options about relationships, health, travel, and even relocating if you're ready to take that kind of step. Living in an adult lifestyle community, most of which are in country-club settings, may be a viable option.

Whichever route you choose, starting a new life is scary and exciting at the same time. It will take legwork, an open mind and patience. Putting in a little time and research now will pay off in the end.

Difficult ethical decisions

One of my favourite teaching activities whenever I visit Israel is a workshop with the staff of the geriatric and rehabilitation unit at Ichilov Medical Center in Tel Aviv.

I have previously taught in the unit, which is headed by Dr. Yaffa Lerman, a geriatrician. I enjoy the workshops, which focus on complex ethical issues.

I decided to try to do this workshop in Hebrew, which I had been brushing up on. It was a bit of a challenge for me, but with patience and good humour and the occasional correction of my fractured grammar and vocabulary by workshop participants, I succeeded, thus adding to my enjoyment of the session.

The case we discussed could just as easily have been presented at Baycrest, which has a large elderly Holocaust-survivor population.

The patient was a female survivor in her late 80s, who had before her admission been living on her own in an apartment in Tel Aviv, apparently "managing" her "normal" activities. There was a question of the patient's claim by some neighbours and her one estranged son, who had, in fact, not seen her in the previous two years and did not visit her while she was hospitalized.

Some weeks before the woman had fallen off a ladder in her apartment while arranging something on a high kitchen cabinet, and when discovered, she had been on the floor for many hours. She was admitted to the geriatric rehabilitation unit with some non-surgical fractures and underwent intensive mobilizing rehabilitation.

Investigations revealed evidence that she'd had a small stroke, which may have been instrumental in her fall, but most importantly, the patient had some degree of cognitive impairment – not enough for a diagnosis of true dementia, but there would be safe at home alone.

Her son from Canada felt that she should not go home, but he did not have authority as a health-care proxy. In fact, at the point of the discussion, it was not clear if she could be declared incompetent, which would mean her decisions would be referred to a government-agency-appointed substitute decision-maker.

The workshop ended with the conundrum unresolved. Despite their concerns, none of the staff wanted to deprive the woman of her autonomy. The plan was to try to convince her to agree to some help at home on a temporary basis, to ensure that she was safe, and therefore avoid the need to consider removing her decision-making rights.

This case and the staff's dilemma reminded me how universal such conundrums are and how important careful deliberation is before such difficult decisions are made.

Iran strike is U.S. call, Kissinger says

Yoel Goldman
The Times of Israel

Military action against Iran is an American decision, and despite Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's assertion, the United States should not set "red lines" for Iran's nuclear program, former U.S. secretary of state Henry Kissinger said last week.

Kissinger told the Washington Post that the United States should not make public statements that could be construed by Israel or any other country as a justification for its going to war.

"We cannot subcontract the right to go to war - that is an American decision," Kissinger said.

The statesman added that the United States must decide for itself what it's willing to live with regarding the Islamic Republic.

"We do need to define for ourselves, when we say that nuclear weapons are unacceptable, nuclear weapons capability is unacceptable. We need to know for ourselves what we mean by that," Kissinger added.

Last month, U.S. President Barack Obama dismissed as "noise" Netanyahu's calls for red lines on Iran's nuclear program. In his speech last month to the United Nations, complete with a visual aid cartoon bomb, Netanyahu again called for a red line that, if crossed, would provide justification for a military strike on the Islamic Republic's nuclear facilities.

Judge Flew in WWII

EDMONTON — Retired judge Samuel Lieberman, who served on his province's highest court, died Sept. 19 at age 90. The Edmonton-born Lieberman was a judge for 31 years, including 21 on the Alberta Court of Appeal. In 1940, after completing one year at the University of Alberta, he enlisted in the Royal Canadian Air Force and served as a pilot until 1945. As a judge, he was the first chairman of the Legal Aid Society of Alberta and helped establish legal aid for people facing criminal charges. He also pushed for and was the first chair of the Alberta Board of Review, which examines the cases of people ruled criminally insane. Until then, they could be held indefinitely. He retired in 1997, the Edmonton Journal reported.

Shul-goers Walk Out

CHICAGO — Some congregants at a Conservative shul in Chicago walked out of Yom Kippur services when the rabbi acknowledged the presence of U.S. Rep. Michele Bachmann. "I am aware of the fact that our congregation's policy in regards to public officials clearly caused pain to some members of our community on the most precious day of reconciliation on the Jewish calendar," Anshe Emet Rabbi Michael Siegel told the Chicago Tribune. "That we regret deeply." Rabbi Siegel had greeted Bachmann (R-Minn.) during the service, citing what he said was a shul custom to recognize public officials. It's unclear why the controversial Bachmann was there.

Synagogue Defaced

BRUSSELS — Two unidentified vandals spray-painted antisemitic slogans on a Brussels shul. Security cameras filmed two men spray-painting "death to the Jews" and "boom" on the wall of Beth Hillel synagogue in the Belgian capital on Oct. 2. The footage was too blurry to identify the vandals. The shul

Malmo Attack Not Hate Crime, Police Say

STOCKHOLM — Police in Malmo, Sweden, said they had "no indication" that a Sept. 28 attack on the offices of the local Jewish community was a hate crime.

Police arrested and later released two 18-year-old men suspected of hurling a brick and a large firecracker at the entrance of the community's offices. The building sustained some damage but no one was hurt.

"The suspects never said or indicated they were perpetrating a hate crime," Anders Lindell, a Malmo police spokesperson, told JTA. He said the suspects denied any involvement in the attack. The investigation is ongoing.

Willy Silberstein of the Swedish Committee Against Anti-Semitism in Stockholm, told JTA that it was a "very strange" decision. "When such incidents are not classified as hate crimes, it does not add to the credibility of government figures on antisemitism," he said.

Sweden has some 20,000 Jews, and several hundred live in Malmo. In 2011, the Swedish National Council for Crime Prevention reported 190 antisemitic crimes in all of Sweden.

signed this month, will send 300,000 euros for educational and social welfare programs to east Jerusalem, the Times of Israel reported. The deal undercuts Israel's claim to east Jerusalem, which Israel considers part of its united capital. "There is very high sensitivity to the Palestinian cause in France," Ille-de-France councilman Jacques Picard said. "This symbolic move is certainly intended to send a political message."

Deal Signed

PARIS — Ile-de-France, the district of France that includes Paris, has signed a co-operation agreement with east Jerusalem, the city's Arab area. The Sept. 28 agreement between Ille-de-France and the Palestinian Authority, which will be

Survivor of Munich massacre looks back

Shaul Ladany

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Back in 1972, as the Olympic hostage crisis came to a head, a German newspaper ran a story with the headline: "On his second visit to Germany, luck didn't hold for Prof. Shaul Ladany."

At the time, even his wife thought Ladany was among the eight Israeli athletes killed by Palestinian terrorists during the summer games in Munich.

It turned out news of his demise was premature. Ladany, a speed walker, had never been captured by the Black September terrorists. The Holocaust survivor, who as an eight-year-old had been interned at the Bergen-Belsen concentration camp, had indeed had luck on his side on his trip to Germany.

Now 75 and a professor of industrial engineering, Ladany was recently in Toronto, where he described his experiences as a member of the 1972 Israeli Olympic team to a UJA Federation of Greater Toronto audience. He, along with five other athletes and an unofficial swimming coach, were in one of three apartments occupied by Israelis when terrorists struck in the early morning hours of Sept. 5, 1972.

Feature

Terrorists entered apartments one and three in the athlete's village, leaving apartment two undisturbed.

Ladany believes it was more than blind luck that spared he and the others. The terrorists had surveilled the building and, using freely available data provided by Olympic officials, knew that Ladany shared a room with two athletes competing in shooting events. At the time, the marksmen were allowed to keep their guns and ammunition in their rooms. It was likely deterring an attack, he speculated.

That, of course, did not help the Israelis in the apartments next to his. Two were killed within minutes as they resisted the onslaught. Terrorists killed the others during a botched rescue attempt by German police.

Despite the passage of 40 years, Ladany can recall the incident in vivid detail.

The evening of the attack, the Israeli team attended a performance of Fiddler on the Roof in a local theatre. The group returned to the athletes' village around midnight. The last thing Ladany did before going to his room at 1 a.m. was to return an alarm clock to wrestling coach Moshe "Muni" Weinberg. "He wanted to get up early to take a wrestler to a weigh-in," Ladany recalled.

After setting the alarm to ring at 5:30, Ladany returned to his room and finally dozed off around 3. He didn't hear the commotion that ensued.

"I'm an excellent sleeper," he said. "As an artillery officer, I could sleep even during shelling."

Cemetery to erect new building

5,000-square-foot structure underway at Bathurst Lawn

Bill Gladstone
Special to The CN

Members of the Ivansker Mutual Benefit Society who attended their annual Yizkor service at Bathurst Lawn Memorial Park cemetery between Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur may have noticed a significant change at the edge of the cemetery grounds: the former house that was the administrative headquarters for the cemetery has been demolished.

The former house was in poor condition and needed to be replaced. So in its place, the Bathurst Lawn Memorial Park Cemetery Association has begun constructing a new multi-functional one-storey 5,000-square-foot building at a cost of about $1.25 million and due for completion in the spring. Another 2,500 square feet of space will be available in the basement.

At the city's insistence, the building will be clad with Jerusalem stone, a creamy white stone that is finer than the stucco exterior originally envisioned and will give the structure a look of solidity and permanence. The architect is Cliff Korman.

"It's going to have a large meeting room, and the meeting room could also serve as a chapel," said Sol Zeifman, co-chair of the building committee. "It could be used for whatever funeral services are necessary, for gravesides [services] in inclement weather, and for unveilings and l'chaims."

The cemetery gates will be reconfigured to allow for building accessibility and parking when the cemetery is closed, Zeifman said, and the design will allow for a second storey, if desired, to be added in future. "Who knows? It may evolve into a community building of sorts if the neighbourhood remains Jewish and the community has a need."

The cemetery is located on the east side of Bathurst Street north of Dewlane Drive, a few blocks south of Steeles Avenue. Probably close to 80 years old, the cemetery is older than almost anything else in the area. Beth Tzedek Memorial Park, another Jewish cemetery a short distance away on the west side of Bathurst Street, was dedicated in 1949.

Artist's depiction of the new building at Bathurst Lawn

Shortly after the Ivansker Mutual Benefit Society formation in 1932, its members purchased the land for the cemetery from a farmer, then began selling off most of it, parcel by parcel, to other Jewish organizations.

Today an alphabet soup of nearly 60 groups, ranging from Adath Israel to the Zagliemmer Society, each owns a section of the cemetery. The list includes such small, obscure and historic groups as Beth Myer, Court Topaz, Husiatner Klaus, Lipsker Young Men, Pultusker Landsmanshaft, Stopnitzker Young Men's Benevolent Association, Tzozmerer Friendly Society and Yavne Zion.

Several years ago, the cemetery association established a community section with nearly 400 plots, all of which quickly sold out. Now the cemetery association plans to redesign its internal roadways, some of which have 66-foot right-of-ways, to free up another 1,100 cemetery plots. Some membership groups, including the Ivanskers, will likely purchase some of the plots for their own members, and the rest will be released for community use.

Jewish cemetery plots currently go for $4,000 to $5,000 in Toronto, Zeifman said. "That's an average price, in that range," he said. "Forty per cent of the money goes into a care and maintenance fund."

Perpetual care and maintenance is a key reason the cemetery association, whose current president is Philip Covshoff, is trying to raise funds. The possibility that the new building may generate revenue is one that pleases the volunteers on the cemetery association executive, including building committee co-chair Abe Neufeld.

"It would be wonderful if the building would have a commercial benefit, because it is going to cost us a bit," Zeifman said. "We'd like to keep the upkeep of the cemetery into perpetuity, so anything we can do to offset the expense of the building would be fantastic."

Gala supports kids with neurological disorders

Cara Edell

Special to The CJN

Heroes Among Us, the theme of this year's Three To Be gala, was chosen to recognize those who support the organization's work to support children with neurological disorders, says Dana Florence, who, with her husband, Jared, founded the group.

"From the children to the doctors, the parents to the donors and volunteers, each is a hero in our eyes, and we want to show them our appreciation by celebrating their dedication," she said.

More than 900 people attended Three To Be's third annual Stems of Hope Gala at KoolHaus in downtown Toronto Sept. 29.

Three To Be is Canada's only registered charity dedicated to raising awareness and funds for research and therapy for a broad spectrum of children's neurological disorders. Its scientific advisory committee is made up of doctors, scientists and professionals in the field of neuro-development.

Founded in 2010, Three To Be supports the Hospital for Sick Children, Holland Bloorview Kids Rehabilitation Hospital and the March of Dimes Canada Academy of Conductive Education (ACE), a school for children with neuro-motor disabilities.

Dana and Jared are the parents of four-year-old triplets Taylor, Cole and Brody, who were all diagnosed with cerebral palsy, a type of brain injury that has no known cure.

Overwhelmed and shocked by the diagnosis, but motivated by love, Dana and Jared decided to turn their situation into one of hope and empowerment with the creation of their organization.

"We are already starting to see the difference that Three To Be is making in the lives of children with neurological disorders and this is because of all the support and love we are getting from so many people," Dana Florence said.

"Seeing the progress, smiles and building hope in the children and their families makes it all worthwhile."

Funds raised at this year's gala will support the group's three initiatives: the Hospital for Sick Children's stem cell program, led by Dr. Freda Miller, and programs at Holland Bloorview and ACE.

The evening was hosted by Leslie Roberts and Anne Mroczkowski of Global News Hour in Toronto and featured hip hop performances by Naughty By Nature, Young MC, Rob Base, and Master G and Wonder Mike from the original Sugarhill Gang.

Guests were transported through the pages of an animated comic book that came to life with retro decor, live action heroes, sumptuous food and an auction.

The Stems of Hope Gala has raised nearly $1.5 million in just two years. Funds raised from the 2011 event went toward the purchase of a Pediatric Lokomat Pro, a robotic device to help children with neurological conditions learn how to walk and gain independence. The device is now being used in a clinical study at Holland Bloorview.

"This year we are also funding the first double-blind crossover drug trial in 30 children treated with radiation for the most common malignant brain tumour at SickKids," Dana Florence said.

"This work can set the stage and provide important initial data for future trials in children with stroke, traumatic brain injury and cerebral palsy. It's exciting to think that by focusing on brain repair, they may bring new hope to families dealing with the effects of brain injury in children."

Dana Florence said Three To Be has given her and her husband hope for Taylor, Cole and Brody, and for all children affected by neurological disorders. The progress her triplets have individually made since their birth has surpassed limitations that were placed on them with their diagnosis.

"Cole was deaf when he was born, and we were told he would never hear. At the age of three, he received cochlear implants and now hears every whisper. It's nothing short of a miracle."

Florence said she and her husband are grateful they have been able to channel their energies in a positive way through Three To Be. "We really don't know what we would do without it."

Murder's underwriters

Dull, tired and ever so predictable was the address last week to the UN General Assembly by Syrian Foreign Minister Walid al-Moallem. Loyalty to his boss, Bashar Assad, or rather fear for his own life, trumped even the slightest pretense on Moallem's part to relevance and connectivity to reality in his regime-defending remarks.

The internal, domestic scuffle gripping Syria, he said, is but a side show threatening to "shift the focus" of the world from the true, core issues standing in the way of peace, harmony and prosperity in the Middle East: the Palestinians and the Golan Heights. Sanctions against the Syrian regime, Moallem told the assembly with a straight face, serve only Israel's "expansionist interests."

Indeed, Israel's current interests regarding Syria are uncomplicated: to keep a very close watch on the border and prevent the increasingly nasty developments from spilling into Israel. Mortars fired by the contending sides at each other recently fell into Israel. No one was hurt. But it was sheer luck, not the acuity of the combatants, that spared Israeli casualties.

Last week, according to Ynet, a group of some 50 Syrians, including armed individuals, approached Israel's border. The IDF ruled out an infiltration attempt but sent forces to keep an eye on the group. Israel's chief of military intelligence, Aviv Kochavi, noted last week that "the weakening of the Syrian regime's grip and the increasing infiltration of global jihad elements pose a new threat, which the army is preparing for."

Despite the best efforts of Iran – and in particular of Qassem Suleimani, the commander of the Quds Force, an elite unit of Iran's Revolutionary Guard, which, according to Ynet, masterminds Iranian strategy with its regional proxies, including Hezbollah and Hamas – Assad has not vanquished the admixture of "rebel" armies fighting him and his regime.

The London Times reported last week that the rulers of Iran have transferred some $10 billion to Assad to pay for the slaughter of his own people. Iran has been paying the salaries of Syrian government troops for months, as well as providing weapons and logistical support.

This report of Iranian financial complicity in this ugly, sadistic Syrian-upon-Syrian war cannot please "ordinary", non-Assad-loyalist Syrians. It is estimated that between 28,000 and 35,000 Syrians have thus far been killed.

Nor can the Iranian people be pleased about their government's profligate, bloodthirsty involvement in Syria when so many of them are struggling merely to support their own families. The Iranian currency fell in value to a record low. Some of the braver Iranians even took to the streets last week in loud protest against their government's policies and its wasteful, immoral underwriting of the ongoing murder, chaos and revenge in Syria.

We applaud their courage.

Remembering brings redemption

Traditionally, Jews have prepared for the holidays of Tishrei by reviewing events of the last year. There are some among us, though, who could not perform the year-end review as they suffer the assaults of time with little memory intact. Because of the Alzheimer's epidemic and the growing tide of dementia in our community, many among us are lost in the timeless and sometimes wordless dimension of forgetfulness. So during those days that have just passed, when we fondly remember those who came before, when we revisit the anniversary of the creation of the world and when we ask to be remembered in the Book of Life, we should pause to remember those around us who cannot.

Those in our community with cognitive impairments also have difficulty participating in the social flow of life and live at the edges of our community. So often, they are forgotten as well. But it's not just whom we are forgetting, but what we are forgetting. If we can remember the languages from yesteryear, the language of play, song, dance and storytelling, the open-hearted expressiveness of youth and even the intimacy created by a shared meal, we can forge a bond with those whom we might otherwise find ourselves forgetting.

In the Torah, Rosh Hashanah is referred to as "Yom HaZikaron," or "the Day of Remembrance." Memory rests at the heart of all we try to accomplish during the High Holidays and the rest of the year, and we can certainly work at being good "rememberers." One way to do that is to recall the words of the Ba'al Shem Tov, who said, "Remembering is the source of redemption. Exile persists as long as one forgets."

Fundraiser organizers thank community

University of Toronto medical students annually create a team called Breast Friends that raises money for Princess Margaret Hospital's weekend to end women's cancers. This year, an extraordinary group came together under the leadership of Nicola Goldberg and Melanie Kalbfleisch. The team raised more than $17,000 over the year. The group held numerous bake sales for the medical students in both first and second year; they organized bar nights and post-exam parties, and they're in the process of creating a cookbook with recipes from students, physicians and faculty to sell to the general public.

However, Breast Friends most exciting event of the year was their extremely successful Pink Tie Affair, held Aug. 30 at the Skybar Nightclub in Toronto. There were more than 500 young adults dressed in pink in attendance, and over $8,000 was raised. Sara Fairweather, Goldberg and I spent the last year organizing the event, and even we could not have imagined a more successful party. Other than medical students, there were hundreds of young Jewish adults in attendance. Without the support of the Jewish community, the amount of money raised and the number of tickets sold would not have been possible. It is so nice to see how our community comes together to support great causes.

Calendar calculations

Due to their rarity, the following Hebrew calendar phenomenon, set to occur in the Gregorian year 2013, might be of interest to your readers. At the present time, the first day of Pesach cannot occur any earlier in the Gregorian calendar than on March 26. This phenomenon last occurred 114 years ago in Gregorian year 1899 and will now happen on March 26, 2013. This earliest Pesach date will next occur 76 years from now in Gregorian year 2089. After that, the earliest Gregorian date for Pesach will be March 27. Pesach will first occur at this new earlier date in Gregorian year 2032.

Assuming that over unlimited time periods the calculation rules remain the same for both the Gregorian and Hebrew calendars, then after Gregorian year 2089, the first day of Pesach will again occur on March 26 in Gregorian year 79431 (corresponding to Hebrew Year 83191). However, at that time, March 26 will be the latest (and not the earliest) Gregorian date possible for the first day of Pesach. A very similar script applies to Rosh Hashanah 5774, whose first Gregorian day is Sept. 5, 2013.

Iran following predictable genocide pattern

Mitch Ginsburg
Times of Israel

Genocide is neither linear nor "inexorable." It is, rather, predictable and preventable, so long as you recognize the universal signs. And Iran, in its language and action, has taken six of the eight steps on the path to genocide, according to Gregory Stanton, the world's foremost expert on the matter.

Stanton, the founder and director of Genocide Watch, the world's first organization to deal exclusively with this issue and the author of an historic two-page paper on the nature of genocide, spoke at the Hebrew University medical school last month. He called for an international campaign to abolish the recurring crime of genocide and for the world to take action, as Canada has, to ostracize Iran and curb its genocidal intent.

Talk of genocide, Stanton said – of removing a cancer or crushing a cockroach – is never just talk. "One of the best predictors of genocide is incitement to genocide," he said, "and I believe that is exactly what Iran is doing today."

Encouraging genocide is a crime. The UN Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of Genocide was signed in 1948 and fathered by Raphael Lemkin, a Jewish Polish lawyer who studied the genocide of the Armenians and invented the term in 1943 – "genos" meaning race or people and "cide" to kill. The convention states that incitement "with intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group" is illegal.

Last month, on precisely those grounds, Canada severed its ties with Iran. John Baird, the minister of foreign affairs, announced that the Iranian regime "engages in racist antisemitic rhetoric and incitement to genocide."

He gave Iranian diplomats five days to leave the country.

Stanton and Elihu Richter, a professor emeritus at the Hebrew University's medical school and the founder of the Jerusalem Center for Genocide Prevention, both hailed the decision.

Richter called it "mighty" and said that the Canadian declaration "sets a powerful precedent for intervening to prevent genocide and genocidal terror by going at the early predictive causes and catalysts, rather than waiting for the body count."

The two are seeking to drag Iran before the International Court of Justice in The Hague, where state actors can prosecute one another. Neither the Israeli Ministry of Foreign Affairs nor the Prime Minister's Office could confirm whether Israel had encouraged Canada to file charges against Iran for incitement to genocide.

The predictable pattern

Recognizing the early signs, spotlighting them and prosecuting those encouraging the killings are some of the ways to prevent genocide. Ignoring them, dismissing them as diabolical rhetoric or as a tactic meant to advance a different goal, is to enable the perpetrators, Stanton said.

Often, genocide goes unrecognized. In the opening slide of Stanton's lecture, three perplexed diplomats, clutching attaché cases that label them as representing the EU, the US and the UN, look around at a patch of desert. Darfur, that is stained with the bodies of the dead. "Well..." says one. "Genocide, genocide..." says another. "Difficult question..." says the third.

Over the years Stanton realized that all genocides follow eight stages. They are, in this order: classification, symbolization, dehumanization, organization, polarization, preparation, extermination and denial.

Iran, he said, had classified and symbolized Israel through exclusionary ideology and hate speech, dehumanized it – "overcoming the normal human revulsion against murder" – by portraying the potential victims as a "cancer" in need of eradication, organized fanatical militias (the Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps), polarized the society by repressing dissent and arresting moderates, prepared for the killing by denying a past genocide and by constructing weapons of mass destruction, and, through global terrorism, even begun the seventh of his eight stages: extermination.

In the past century alone there have been 55 genocides, leaving 70 million people dead, Stanton said. The Armenians, the Jews and the Tutsi of Rwanda were the rare examples of one group's campaign to destroy another group in its entirety, he said. More often, the case is that one group seeks to partially eradicate another – perhaps the educated classes or those living in a certain geographic region. For instance, in 1971, Pakistani forces killed somewhere between 300,000 and three million Bangladeshis. They did not seek to annihilate all Hindus in what was then known as East Pakistan, but the crime, Stanton said, must be considered genocide.

The call to service

Stanton, a small-town Illinois native and the son of a Presbyterian pastor, realized he had to devote his life to the prevention of genocide in 1981, while sitting in the office of a Yale psychiatrist.

A graduate of the Harvard Divinity School with a PhD in cultural anthropology from the University of Chicago, he was in his second year at Yale Law School, recently back from a year in Cambodia, where he had worked for the Church World Service, bringing relief to the victims of the Khmer Rouge. He and his wife had adopted a daughter there and he should have been happy, he said, but instead he had slipped into a deep depression. His wife insisted he see a psychiatrist, who asked what was bothering him. He told of the mass graves and the survivor testimonies and the little corpse in the tattered Mickey Mouse t-shirt.

The doctor told him that if he weren't depressed there would be something wrong with him. The doctor added that he, like many others who have studied depression, feel it is a form of repressed anger. "Then he looked at me and said: 'What are you angry about?'" Stanton recalled.

Stanton's response: the fact that the Khmer Rouge had organized and perpetrated the killing of 1.7 million Cambodians and still remained in power.

From that moment on, the prevention of genocide became his life's work.

He founded the Cambodia Genocide Project and spent decades pushing for the indictment of those responsible. He helped establish the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda and was awarded the American Foreign Service Association's W. Averell Harriman Award for "intellectual courage and creative accomplishment."

Nonetheless, in the late nineties, he was fired from the State Department. His supervisor, frustrated with his efforts to document what he called "the appalling cowardice" of the department in April 1994 – when it voted to withdraw all UN-AMIR peacekeepers in Rwanda in the face of a mounting genocide – wrote the type of evaluation that she knew would eventually terminate his career. "Greg apparently does not understand that the State Department is a hierarchical organization," he quoted, with obvious pleasure, during the lecture.

Before leaving the State Department, he wrote the two-page paper that is at the heart of his presentation and work.

Since then, Stanton, a descendant of Elizabeth Cady Stanton and Henry Brewster Stanton – a founder of the woman's liberation movement and an abolitionist – has founded the International Campaign to End Genocide. It rests on two fundamental principles: that genocide is "unlike a hurricane" and therefore predictable, and that the phenomenon has become wretchedly common.

"It's like slavery," he said, "a giant elephant in the room that everyone is ignoring."

Put not your trust in princes

Consider the ping-pong ball: it's served from one side of a net, making a little "pock" sound as it strikes the table. The responding player hits it back across the table, "pock-pock." Sooner or later, one side slams the ball across the net too forcibly for the opposition to return it, and a point is awarded. And so on and so forth, until a winner emerges.

In the United States, with the fall presidential campaign in overdrive, Jews and Israel are that unhappy ball.

Republican challenger Mitt Romney's recent visit to Israel, where he exhibited an even stiffer demeanour than usual, was one serve. Take that, Obama! Whack! See how the Jews of Israel love me, Jews of America, vote for me!

Now the ball goes back to President Barack Obama. He carefully lobs it in Romney's direction, but since he has that dodgy Muslim-sounding name, it's a weak response, and besides, he didn't go to Jerusalem and carefully place a small request in the Kotel, then march away with a rabbi strolling by his side, so -pock! Romney seems to win that round.

And so forth.

Up here beyond the 49th parallel, we have a prime minister who loves us. Everyone tells me so. We should be grateful. We should vote for him because he loves us. Given the insecurity of the opposition, so far, Stephen Harper slams the ball repeatedly across the net and seems to win all the points. Given his unconditional love for us, we, the Jews of Canada, are to forgive his

Jean M. Gerber
in Vancouver

authoritarian style. Because he loves Israel.

Pock! Here comes a hard serve from Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. America! Draw that red line in the sand! No, he wouldn't think of interfering in the U.S. elections, but watch that smooth manoeuvre when he speaks of whom he - read: the people of Israel - would like to see win the White House. (Note: so far Bibi has not drawn a red line.)

Here comes a smash. Watch out, Obama.

And so forth.

Here's what I think: Israel has a government for which its people voted - perhaps, as with our current government, not one the majority of people chose, but one the system delivered. I may think the government's decisions are damaging to Israel's long-term interests, but I have only my opinion, and I'm merely a private individual.

I do think that no Israeli politician - I repeat, no Israeli politician - has the right to interfere in such a momentous event as the American national elections. The recent appearances and statements by Netanyahu are totally inappropriate, and many Americans may think so, too.

A similar interference with our elections would be, to say the least, inappropriate and damaging, resented, I'm sure, by Canadians.

In other words, butt out and let the voters decide.

For example, I believe that it ill behooves Canada to cut off diplomatic relations with another country if that country hasn't declared war on us. Maybe doing so is in our best interests as our government sees them. If, however, it's done simply to pander to a segment of the electorate - a segment that includes Jews - then it's a very, very bad decision indeed.

Please don't wave Israel in front of us as if it were some kind of panacea. Or as if we're a gullible ping-pong ball.

What's more important to me is what's happening in our own country. Is our government delivering what we as Canadians expect: universal health care, support for scientific research, decisions based on that research and realities, intelligent policy on immigration, support for families and children in particular, a strategy on poverty elimination, and a sensible and sensitive environmental policy? Need I go on? That's what I want to see offered to me as a voter.

The last thing I want are politicians donning kippot and swanning around at various Jewish functions looking as if they actually knew what was going on. Today they love us, but tomorrow, if need be, they'll find a way to do what they deem to be politically necessary. If we stand in the way, too bad. If Israel stands in the way, ditto.

"Put not your trust in princes, in a human who offers no rescue," the Psalmist tells us, and with good reason.

We do well to keep this in mind.

Making holidays into holy days

We have just come through another month of chaggim, those ubiquitous holidays that start off the school year. We call them holy days. What is the difference between holidays and holy days?

Let me state at the outset that I often get irritated with this interruption of my work week. At times, there is a full month of days missed, of classes to make up, of studies lost and work piled up. I need to write, be at meetings and get stuff done. These days are lost to me as working days, and while my colleagues get ahead, I fall behind. On top of that complaint, my very traditional role brings with it an added burden. It sometime feels like I cook and clean up all the time. There are often three days strung together during which we eat, go to synagogue and then eat large meals again and again. All that "festive" time requires advance preparation, marketing and cooking. In order to invest joy in our meals, guests are invited, again requiring extra kitchen work. So much for the spirituality of the moment. We're called upon to be happy on these festivals, but doing the dishes at 11 p.m. is a strain on the joy factor.

So where's the simchah, the elation, of holy days? Where can we find the fullness of the holidays during this month in modernity?

A holiday is a vacation. In a way, these days are vacations that are imposed on us. The challenge is to find in them ways and means to break with our daily and annual routines. How can we do that?

The method developed in our tradition is to confront the work ethic and space in a new frame. What does that mean to me? I had to use these days off to figure out what chafes at work and what is smooth. What angers and what calms me in my career? Slowly, as I sat and prayed, the twists in my gut became guides to problems and expenditures that perhaps I should no longer be paying. Perhaps by taking some time away from classes when I don't have time, I'm forced to understand the essentials of teaching and the price of education. Challenged by time off, if I listen carefully to myself, I can learn a lot. Slowly, I can come to grips with issues central to my core of beliefs and goals. Slowly this forced vacation from teaching has turned into a spiritual quest, into a holy day.

So, too, can my other petty complaints be exposed. Yes, I spend too much time in the food department. But truth be told, I love it, even though I am bone tired. I love feeding people good food. I enjoy cooking, making intricate meal plans and designing new recipes. I like having a diverse group of people around my table talking, arguing, and laughing. To me, the holidays become sanctified as guests sit around a table and bless the food I prepare. So I'm tired and overworked, but I know of no other way to make the days sacred. The rituals of holy days are centred in shared meals.

in Montreal

Somehow our ancestors understood the need for holiness and for celebration.

They anchored our tradition with these elaborate rituals of prayer and food. And it can work. Perhaps it's a bit overdone. Perhaps two to three days of yom tov, holy day, is too much for anyone. Perhaps we would all do better with the Israeli model: one day of yom tov only.

But no matter the number of days, the actual experience depends on a great deal of human effort, both spiritual and physical. Without real preparation, understanding and intention, nothing works well. After many decades, I'm beginning to get it. I'll still complain. That's my nature. The physical can overwhelm me and take precedence over the existential and the holy. I do live in the moment.

But once we can get into the fullness of the actual celebration, the joy of the ritual moment takes charge, as it's meant to. The holiday becomes a holy day, and I'm surrounded by joy and a glimpse of the sacred.

German filmmaker directs Arendt biopic

Margarethe von Trotta, widely regarded as one of Germany's most talented and accomplished film directors, was irresistibly drawn to Hannah Arendt, the renowned German-Jewish philosopher and political theorist.

"She is a very important thinker," von Trotta said. "Some of her books have a lot to do with Germany's past. So I was interested."

So much so that her latest movie, premiered at the Toronto International Film Festival last month, is a biopic on Arendt, who was born in 1906 and died in 1975.

Hannah Arendt, as von Trotta's thoughtful, brooding film is plainly titled, focuses on the period from 1961 to 1964, a tumultuous period in her life.

Arendt left Nazi Germany after being interrogated by the Gestapo. She fled to France, only to be imprisoned for several weeks in the Gurs detention camp. In 1940, she and her second husband, Heinrich Blucher, a German poet and Marxist philosopher, immigrated to the United States, where she taught at a succession of universities.

In 1960, a team of Mossad agents kidnapped German war criminal Adolf Eichmann in Buenos Aires and brought him back to Israel to face justice. Fired up by Eichmann's capture, Arendt asked the editor of The New Yorker, William Shawn, whether she could cover the trial. He agreed, thrilled that a writer of her calibre and status would represent the magazine in Jerusalem.

Shawn had read one of her major works, The Origins of Totalitarianism, which traces the roots of communism and fascism against the backdrop of antisemitism and imperialism, and had been impressed by the depth of Arendt's knowledge and analytical powers.

Arendt's article in The New Yorker evolved into a book, Eichmann in Jerusalem: A Report on the Banality of Evil, published in 1963 amid a firestorm of controversy.

With the Holocaust in mind, Arendt wrote that evil acts are not necessarily committed by fanatics or sociopaths, but by ordinary and thoughtless people like Eichmann. Arendt also claimed that, without the co-operation of Nazi-appointed Jewish councils in ghettos, the Jewish death toll would likely have been lower. This claim, in particular, elicited a torrent of dissent from New Yorker readers and her old friends, who accused Arendt of coldness and a lack of empathy for the victims of the Holocaust.

Sheldon Kirshner
in Toronto

Von Trotta, 70, who was born in wartime Berlin and co-wrote the script of Hannah Arendt with associate Pam Katz, was captivated by this episode in her career.

"Originally, I thought of covering her whole life," said von Trotta in an interview during the festival. "But we couldn't possibly fit it all into one film. I thought it would be better to concentrate on a small but important moment. It became clear that focusing on the four years where she reported on and wrote about Eichmann was the best way to portray both the woman and her work and to gain a deeper understanding of dark times in 20th-century Europe."

In the movie, which in part was funded by the Israel Film Fund and may well open in North American theatres in 2013, Arendt, played by the German actress Barbara Sukowa, almost dreads the prospect of dredging up the Nazi past by attending the Eichmann trial. Her loving husband, too, is wary, saying it may well bring back terrible memories.

As she intently listens to Eichmann's testimony, which is resurrected in black-and-white film footage that seamlessly blends into the fabric of von Trotta's film, Arendt reaches two conclusions: Eichmann is a "nobody" in terms of character and intelligence, and is career driven rather than personally antisemitic. As these scenes unfold, there are flashbacks to Arendt's passionate love affair with Martin Heidegger, her professor at the University of Marburg, where she studied philosophy.

Heidegger joined the Nazi party in 1933, the year Adolf Hitler assumed power, and while she was highly critical of his decision, she renewed her friendship with him after the war and never stopped believing he was one of the most important philosophers of the 20th century.

The film portrays Arendt as a person who was both vulnerable and arrogant.

She dismissed vehement criticism of her New Yorker piece as a tempest in a teapot, disingenuously claiming it was merely an article in a magazine. Later, with considerable disdain, she described the reaction to her article as "hysterical."

When one of her friends said she had suppressed her pain and was too detached from the Holocaust, she declared, "I refuse to explain myself to these dimwits!"

As for her response to critics who berated her attitude toward Jewish Councils under the Nazi occupation, Arendt denied having blamed Jews for their destruction, asserted she was not a self-hating Jew and plaintively wondered, "Is there something between resistance and co-operation?"

Margarethe von Trotta

Von Trotta, a former actor who has always been interested in portraying strong women on the screen, said Arendt was devastated by the sharp criticism directed against her.

"She didn't realize they would be so severe. But the attacks on her could be thoughtless," Many of the critics, she noted, had not even bothered reading Eichmann in Jerusalem.

Asked whether she agrees with Arendt's harsh characterization of the Jewish Councils, she replied, "I don't know. I'm not a historian, but I couldn't ignore this topic."

Von Trotta, who in 1986 directed Rosa Luxemburg, a film that revolves around a 20th-century Jewish revolutionary murdered by German fascists in the wake of World War I, cast Sukowa as Arendt because she envisaged her in that role right from the outset. "I would not have made this film without Barbara," she said.

Sukowa, her longtime collaborator who won the best actress award at the Cannes Film Festival by playing Luxemburg, acknowledged that portraying Arendt was a challenging proposition.

"It was difficult getting in her head," she observed as she sat next to von Trotta. "I studied her carefully, how she moved, how she spoke. I don't look like her, but we focused on ideas rather than physical resemblances."

Sukowa, a star in the movies of the legendary German filmmaker Rainer Werner Fassbinder, said that Arendt's story is symptomatic of how an evil ideology, personified by the Nazis, can disfigure an otherwise civilized society.

Von Trotta, who in 2003 directed Rosenstrasse, a film about German Christian women who in 1943 mount a demonstration in Berlin to protest the planned deportations of their Jewish husbands, concurs with Sukowa's appraisal.

"There was," she said, "a total moral collapse in Nazi Germany."

Geek meets chic for young professionals

Vicky Tobianah

Special to the CJN

As young professionals mingled in a room with the periodic table of elements lining the wall, alcoholic drinks were served in science beakers by servers wearing lab coats.

The atmosphere showed that science was more chic than geek at the official Geek Chic launch party of the W League, Weizmann Canada's young professionals' division, in downtown Toronto on Sept. 27.

"Lots of people don't know much about the Weizmann Institute," said W League co-chair, Corbin Seligman, 24. "So we wanted to not only raise funds but also raise awareness so in the future they could become the base support of Weizmann Canada, and have fun doing it."

His family has been involved with Weizmann Canada for a long time, he said, and about a year ago, Marni Brinder Byk, its development manager at the time (now on leave), brought up the idea of having a young professionals division.

"We wanted to get the new generation involved," she said. "Unfortunately, Weizmann is the best kept secret."

That's why the W League was created. "It's the start of something much bigger in the way of supporting Israel and science, in a way people never knew they could," said Neal Dlin, a co-chair of the W League.

The league's name dates back to the original Weizmann League, founded in the 1960s. Many original members are still ardent supporters.

The event was designed to prove that science can be cool, Seligman explained.

More than 200 people filled the room. Green-haired waiters wearing wide-rimmed glasses and lab coats handed out drinks, with candy filling beakers on every table, and enough 3D glasses to go around. The crowd participated in live science experiments, with some holding beakers filled with pink bubbly gasses spilling out.

But the co-chairs said they hoped to achieve more than just a party. "We wanted to bring more charity into the event," Dlin said.

They did this by handing out bracelets with the name of one of the areas of research that the institute focuses on: cancer research, education, technology, our planet and health and medicine. Large posters around the room explained recent achievements in those fields.

"The 'doctor in a cell,' the world's smallest computer, may someday diagnose illnesses and even administer treatments in the human body," was one achievement listed under technology.

Funds raised from the event will go toward supporting mental health. "We said to the young people: what interests you, how do you see yourself being involved? And they chose to focus on mental health, all while showing that to be a geek is to be chic," Brinder Byk said. One of the young professionals at the event said he wanted to give back to Weizmann Canada.

Davin Young and his physics classmates at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy's Kimel Family Education Centre in Vaughan won physics competitions in both grades 11 and 12, which sent their teams to the Weizmann Institute of Science in Israel.

"This event made me realize that not a lot of people know what it is or what the Weizmann is doing," said Young, 23, now a research and development engineer at inMotive. "They have the most interesting discoveries, I just love what the Weizmann is doing."

Was Netanyahu a hit or a bomb at the UN?

It was predictable: Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's drawing of a red line on a picture of an Iranian nuclear bomb during his Sept. 27 address to the UN General Assembly elicited highly polarized reactions.

Some saw it as an effective way to communicate to a wide audience just how imminent and dangerous an Iranian bomb is. Others, including even those such as the Atlantic's Jeffrey Goldberg who sympathize with Israel's Iran predicament, said it was a degrading prop and was bound to have the opposite impact.

As Goldberg wrote in his Atlantic blog on Sept. 28: "Netanyahu shouldn't have waved around that cartoonish drawing on the podium

And indeed talk about the "cartoon" was everywhere.

But on what Sommer describes as the key question – "(D)id it really help move Netanyahu's case forward in terms of motivating the global community to crack down on Iran and support his 'red line'?" – there is only continuing debate.

One irony, which was picked up by a number of Israeli analysts, is that while one would assume the diagram was carefully drawn to show where Iran must be stopped before it can have a functioning weapon, it was in fact confusing.

The bomb was divided into three stages: the first, largest stage showed that Iran was already "70 per cent" of the way there. The second stage indicated it would soon be "90 per cent" to its goal and that the "red line" had to be drawn at the top of this stage just before Iran could complete the third and final stage of actually having the bomb.

However, at the "90 per cent" point (if this meant 90 per cent fuel enrichment, which is weapons grade), it would already be too late to stop Iran.

While western journalists have done a good job explaining the Iranian nuclear threat overall, they have done a poor job explaining in layman's terms where Iran is now (at 20 per cent fuel enrichment) and where it needs to get (to 90 per cent enrichment) and how long that will take, given that, according to the latest (August) report by the International Atomic Energy Agency, Iran has installed more centrifuges at its Fordo nuclear site to speed up this process. One doesn't need to be a nuclear expert to understand this.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu addresses the General Assembly.
[Avi Ohayon/GPO photo]

But one might have assumed that Netanyahu would have made this clear in his drawing and explanation. He did not.

In the Sept. 29 Ha'aretz, Amos Harel, the paper's military affairs correspondent clarified the issue: "The 90 per cent that Netanyahu was talking of is a red line representing quantity, not purity, meaning obtaining 90 per cent of the amount [of uranium] required to produce a nuclear weapon... Keep in mind that Netanyahu is still talking about uranium enriched to 20 per cent purity... from which it will be possible to later produce a nuclear bomb, after it is further enriched. This, says Netanyahu, is a threshold that is unacceptable to Israel. Iran is expected to pass this threshold next summer, if it isn't stopped."

Even cartoons can make this much clear.

New principal learned to teach at kibbutz

Veteran educator takes over at Paul Penna

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Laila Lipetz, the new principal of the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School, owes her career, indirectly, to a stint as a teenage kibbutz volunteer about four decades ago.

Lipetz, then known as Laila Merkur, met her kibbutznik husband the year she turned 19, and her career as a Jewish educator began by chance during the 11 years they lived in Israel.

The veteran educator, 59, replaces Rhonda Rosenheck, who was principal for the past two years.

A curriculum coordinator and vice-principal at the school during its early years, Lipetz returned to Penna last year as director of curriculum. She has also taught at Leo Baeck Day School and the Downtown Jewish Community School, and she attended Associated Hebrew Schools through Grade 8.

Lipetz, now a mother of four grown children, was married in Toronto, where she was born and raised, and moved to Kibbutz Ayelet Hashachar in northern Israel when her oldest child was one year old.

With an honours BA in English Literature from the University of Toronto, she was asked to teach English at the local kibbutz high school.

"I just stepped into a classroom and started teaching," she said. At the same time, she earned a diploma that would give her teaching credentials in Israel. In time, she took on an administrative role at the kibbutz school, becoming a grade co-ordinator.

Her diploma wasn't recognized on her return to Toronto, and she began to work as a Hebrew teacher.

In her spare time, she earned Hebrew teaching credentials at the now-defunct Midrasha L'Morim. She also earned a teaching degree and a master's degree in education at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education at the University of Toronto.

In a letter to parents of Penna students this summer, Lipetz wrote that it was a pleasure to return to the school last year after a hiatus of nine years.

"This school suits someone like me," she told The C/N. "It's pluralistic. It honours diversity of practice."

Her goals as principal include ensuring that the children "are able to make meaningful connections with Judaism, themselves and the world, and the world of knowledge."

As well, she added, "community is so central a part of how we see ourselves here... We teach the children how to relate as a community, how to care for one another," and make the world a better place.

The Penna school often reminds her of the kibbutz school where she started her career because of its small size (about 150 students from senior kindergarten through Grade 8), integrated curriculum, and "very thoughtful, meaningful pedagogy."

At the kibbutz school, "they go beyond the walls of the actual school and engage with the physical environment. You go out to the fields, visit neighbouring villages." Likewise, Penna is "a downtown-minded school. We see ourselves embracing the diversity that is downtown Toronto. We do frequent field trips to downtown venues... often we can walk to many of the venues."

Lipetz feels her approach as an administrator was also influenced by her time in Israel, where she developed "a tremendous commitment and respect for collaboration and working together."

Hamilton library exhibit sparks controversy

Abigail Cukier
Special to the CTN

HAMILTON — The Hamilton Jewish community was divided recently over a response to an anti-Israel exhibit at the Hamilton Public Library's central branch.

Sponsored by Canadians for Justice and Peace in the Middle East (CJPME), the exhibit — titled 'A Child's View from Gaza' — features 26 drawings "by Gaza children from five to 14 years of age, created during the course of art therapy."

The Hamilton Jewish Federation appealed to the library in a formal letter to cancel the exhibit, then said it was satisfied when the display was moved to a less conspicuous area.

But some local activists were not.

"I think they could have mobilized the community or tried legally to shut it down. Then maybe next time around it wouldn't happen," said Hamilton resident Gary Gerofsky. "I would like to see activism. There is none in this country. I don't think, except in small pockets."

Gerofsky said many people have even questioned the validity of the claim the art was done by children, noting its sophistication.

The exhibit was on display from Sept. 14 to 29, with a special reception held Sept. 22. The exhibit is now at the city's Centenary United Church, to be followed for two weeks at another as-yet-unconfirmed Hamilton venue.

Lorne Finkelstein, chair of the federation's public relations committee, called the library's response the "best outcome without raising this into the public spectrum."

"We thought that if we do bring this to the media or write letters to the Hamilton Spectator, they would print other letters, and the other side would get the last word."

From the CJPME exhibit shown in Hamilton

he said.

Finkelstein said he had a "very productive" discussion with Hamilton's chief librarian, Paul Takala, who promised the library would display an exhibit sponsored by the federation.

"Some have suggested including posters of the ravages of terrorism. But that just perpetuates the cycle," Finkelstein said. "Why not include images of love, humanity and goodwill to others? Isn't that a much nicer view to show the public?"

In his letter to the library, Finkelstein, a cardiologist, noted that several months ago the library had rejected an exhibit sponsored by Save a Child's Heart (SACH), a group of Israeli pediatric cardiac surgeons and nurses who volunteer to provide free surgical care to non-Israeli patients.

"Our federation sponsored an evening to show the photo display...at Beth Jacob Synagogue," Finkelstein wrote. "We raised $30,000 and were able to sponsor the care for three children. Our committee chose children from Gaza, the West Bank and from Ethiopia. We used the Beth Jacob facility, because the Hamilton Public Library told me that their facilities aren't used for such political events."

Finkelstein suggested bringing back the SACH exhibit or finding another positive one.

Takala, who took over as library chief this past spring, said he had no knowledge of Finkelstein approaching the library regarding the SACH display.

Takala said he told Finkelstein that he had concerns about cancelling the CJPME exhibit, because of the library's contract with the group.

He said that when the CJPME exhibit arrived, it included photos that had not been approved by the library. Takala said those were removed immediately.

The exhibit was on the first floor during the city's Art Crawl event and then moved up to the fourth floor. It was moved downstairs to a private room for a Sept. 22 CJPME reception and then returned to the fourth floor.

"It was representing one perspective in a conflict. We look for other perspectives to be represented in the future," Takala said. "As a library, we present a variety of viewpoints. If we have a book that people don't agree with, we don't take it out of the library. We just make sure we have other books that represent the other side of that viewpoint."

"I look forward to working with the Hamilton Jewish Federation in the future."

London federation set to launch campaign

Honoree got started writing letters to the editor

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Jacob Peretz, an Israeli-Canadian who has been volunteering in the Jewish community for more than a decade, will be honoured later this month at the London Jewish Federation's annual campaign launch.

Peretz, who moved to London, Ont., in 1988, will receive the David Rubinoff Family Leadership Award for his dedication to the Jewish community.

"I believe in supporting the Jewish community," Peretz told The C/N in advance of the Oct. 14 event, to be held at the London Jewish Community Centre.

He said when the second intifadah broke out in late 2000, he was motivated to speak out in support of Israel.

"There were such vile media attacks against Israel that I just couldn't take it anymore. It just bothered me so much," he said.

In 2001, Peretz co-founded and chaired the community relations committee. The following year, he founded the Israel Lecture Series, which brought prominent pro-Israel speakers to London to talk about Israeli history as well as the current climate in the Jewish state.

"I believe that you have to fight for it all the time, whether it's in the local media... it's important to defend Israel. We have many enemies and we have many people who we think are our friends, but they are not our friends," Peretz said.

He said he first began defending Israel by writing letters to the editor of the London Free Press.

"People in the community would listen to CBC and CNN, which was not presenting Israel favourably, and they thought the world was ending for Israel and the Jewish community. I figured I had to start doing something, and I thought I had to help educate people. How do you educate? With lectures. You go back to school," Peretz said.

Each February, Peretz organizes a series held at the London JCC. Earlier this year, Canadians for Israel's Legal Rights co-founder Salomon Ben-Zimra, University of Toronto history professor Derek Penslar and Sun TV anchor Ezra Levant participated in the event.

He recalled one year when he invited doctors and scientists to speak about the medical and technological achievements coming out of Israel.

"It was a good morale booster for the community to hear that," he said.

Peretz hopes that the film Israel Inside: How a Small Nation Makes a Big Difference, which is being screened at the campaign launch, will have a similar effect.

Peretz's advice to those who are concerned about anti-Israel rhetoric in the mainstream media and in their community is to work for Israel.

"If you have compassion, the faith and commitment, and love Israel, you have to work for it, you have to support it and you have to help it. It's not enough to say you go back to Israel every year," he said.

"You have to... let people know they have to fight all this antisemitism. It's so bad out there. Even when it's quiet, it's still bad."

He added that it's important for people to be confident in their conviction that Israel has a right to exist.

"[Israel] doesn't need permission from anyone [to exist]... No one else in the world is told what to do, but we have all kinds of advisers telling us what we should do."

More importantly, Israel needs moral support from the Diaspora community, he said.

"They have a big struggle ahead of them with Iran, the Arab Spring. It's terrible... [Israel] needs our support more than anything. They need to know that we are with them."

For more information about the London Jewish Federation's campaign launch, call 519-673-3310.

Visionary, Generous Community Leader Chaim Neuberger Passes Away

Philanthropist's Gift Made the Creation of New Holocaust Education Centre Possible

By Daniel Horowitz

On Tuesday, September 25th, as we prepared for Yom Kippur, a bright light in the life of Jewish Toronto was forever eclipsed.

As we readied to make our way to synagogue, word came that Chaim Neuberger had passed away at his home. The courageous, visionary and generous community leader's gift to UJA Federation's Tomorrow Campaign made possible the creation of a new state-of-the-art Holocaust Education Centre for UJA Federation's Sherman Campus, located on Bathurst Street, just north of Sheppard Avenue.

Upon completion, the Sarah and Chaim Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre will help to ensure that the memory of the six million Jews who died in the Shoah will live on, while welcoming as many as 100,000 visitors annually.

In 2008, when Chaim announced his generous gift, he made his reasons clear:

"Educating people of all faiths about the Holocaust is so important to me; after all, I'm a part of the Holocaust," said Chaim, whose entire family – his parents, four brothers and one sister, were all killed by the Nazis. "I was the youngest in my family and they were all taken from me and murdered. Holocaust education is so important because nobody lives forever, including my generation. We need what happened documented, so people can see the facts, the photos... We need to tell the stories. There are those out there who even deny that the Holocaust ever took place. We want to build this centre so that all people, of all ages and all nationalities, will learn the truth, and learn from the lessons of the past."

Chaim only managed to escape the same fate due to the heroic selflessness of a non-Jewish Polish family who took him in – along with nine other Jews – and hid them for nine months in a tiny bunker – only 3 meters by one meter – closets and even a horse stable, where Chaim would often sleep under piles of straw and hay.

"I remember the family very well – Victor and Josefa Kotowicz – may their memories be a blessing, they were obviously very generous," said Chaim. "Josefa would always prepare proper meals for us and slide them through an opening in a closet, or wherever we were hiding at the time. It was this way for all those months until the Russians came and we were all liberated. If the Nazis knew what this family was doing, they would have been killed along with all of us. They gambled their lives for us."

Sarah and Chaim Neuberger in 2000

For years after the war ended, Chaim expressed his gratitude by regularly sending money to the family that saved his life.

After the war, he decided to leave Poland, travelling to Austria and Italy before ultimately making Canada his home.

It was thanks to a special initiative by the Canadian government that sponsored Jewish orphans that Chaim came to this country in 1948. After docking in Halifax, he went to Montreal before ultimately deciding to give Toronto a try. His instincts proved correct as, within just a few short years, he began to find success in the city's booming building business.

He also found personal success, with his wife of 46 years, Sarah. The couple had two daughters – Edie and Myra – and eight grandchildren. Sarah passed away ten years ago.

"Chaim Neuberger left a legacy of leadership, compassion and caring," said Ted Sokolsky, President & CEO, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. "Not only did he build for the future for his family, he did what the greatest community leaders through our history have always done, he built for future generations, and he ensured that, through the centre that bears his name, and the name of his beloved wife, the lessons of the Holocaust will never be forgotten. It amazes me that a man who endured so much tragedy was still so full of compassion. What a tremendous legacy Chaim has left."

The Neuberger gift will ensure that the voices and legacies of Chaim, Sarah and other Canadian survivors will be preserved and transmitted to future generations through multi-media, exhibits and public programs.

Honey Sherman, the Chair of the Sarah and Chaim Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre, praised the Neuberger family for their commitment to education. "This gift enables the Centre to expand its reach to multiple communities and generations of Canadians and beyond," said Sherman. "With quiet dignity, Chaim Neuberger was a true and visionary leader. The new Sarah and Chaim Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre will be a beacon of understanding and inspiration."

The Centre's Executive Director, Mira Goldfarb, who took on the role shortly after the Neuberger gift for the new facility was made, reflected on the importance of this investment in the future of Holocaust education. "It is a true privilege to work with our leadership in making the Neuberger vision a reality," said Goldfarb. "The Centre has grown from strength to strength with the dedication of remarkable founders and volunteers to remember the past and educate for the future. The Neuberger family have created a tremendous opportunity for us to fulfill, in the name of Sarah and Chaim z"l, for the benefit of all."

Chaim's funeral was held on Thursday, September 27th at Beth Tzedec Congregation.

"Chaim Neuberger could not erase the sadness of his European past," said Rabbi Baruch Frydman Kohl in delivering Chaim's eulogy. "He didn't talk about it or dwell on it with his family. But he didn't despair; he carried his memory forward, enabling the story of European Jewry to live on through the Sarah and Chaim Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre."

The family has requested that memorial donations be made to the Sarah and Chaim Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre by calling 416.635.2883 Ext.5153

Criticizing Islam called taboo

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Academics who study Islamic antisemitism are risking career advancement and younger scholars are shying away from the subject as a result, said Montreal native Charles A. Small, who headed a Yale University program in antisemitism until it was shut down last year amid controversy.

The Oxford-educated Small is currently the Koret Distinguished Scholar at Stanford University's Hoover Institution in California and director of the New York-based Institute for the Study of Global Antisemitism and Policy, which he founded.

While in Montreal to visit family for the holidays, Small gave a talk at the Canadian Institute for Jewish Research. The title summed up the dire situation that Small believes faces Israel, the Jewish community and anyone concerned with the preservation of democracy and human rights: "Incitement to Genocidal Antisemitism: Radical Islam and the Acquiescence of the Western Intellectuals and Policy Makers."

Words of hope and sorrow in Czestochowa

Dorothy Lipovenko

A steady stream of visitors flows through the cemetery's wrought-iron gates, with pebbles, not petals, in hand. The stones are smooth or ruddy with age, their round edges or sharp corners a reminder of what is a life lived.

This is the time of year that Jews, regardless of status or religious bent, are carried as one on the wings of the same ritual: a visit to the gravesite of deceased family members, especially one or both parents. It's a ritual with its own rhythm: Kaddish, the memorial prayer, is recited; people stand quietly, lost in memories as clear and comforting as the fall sun. Hearts open, and hands, too, as stone is placed on stone. Like sentries, the little rocks are lined up atop headstones, a symbolic gesture to show that someone has been there, keeping memory alive.

As the decades have lengthened since my husband's parents passed away, the protocol of this visit has evolved: part prayer, part thank-you, and of late, fanning out to include conversation. Since moving back to my hometown of Montreal 12 years ago, our time at the Toronto cemetery now includes a little talk with my in-laws, a recap of how we are doing, what's going on with us. Of course, this transpires in our heads, but a dialogue it is nonetheless.

We look forward to the annual journey, but this year was the first in a long while we couldn't go. As luck would have it, history and a distant cousin caught up with us, with an email invitation to attend a service in Montreal honouring the Jews of Czestochowa, Poland, who perished in the Holocaust. Only about 1,500 survived Hitler's atrocities; my in-laws were among them.

Life is curious this way: people you've never met or haven't seen in decades get in touch at just the right moment, often when your need is greater than theirs. And that is how my husband and I recently found ourselves at Montreal's main Jewish cemetery, joining Czestochowa survivors and their families at a special spot: a tall monument engraved with names of the town's Holocaust dead, near a plaque marking the burial site of ashes from the ovens of Treblinka, the concentration camp where many Czestochowa Jews were sent.

Against this backdrop, we listened to words of hope and sorrow, stories of selfless heroism and of wartime survival in narrow pits of suffocating darkness. Framed against the unparalleled luxury of postwar freedom, these stories swell in significance as our own century tips into greater peril.

Later, we again step back in time, when a fragment of family history leaps into view: my husband spots sees his surname on the Czestochowa monument and learns it is a great-uncle.

Memorial services such as this walk a line between what was and what is, reminding us of the past while keeping us vigilant in the present. And there is a third dimension, the future, which lives large with promise in the fresh slate of a new year.

One of the prayers at Rosh Hashanah had the phrase "the treasury of life." Oh, how true, but when I think of my in-laws being among the Holocaust's survivors, life seems more like a lottery. It will be a good point for "discussion" the next time we visit at their gravesite.

Free Gaza co-founder tweets antisemitic message

Greta Berlin currently on Canadian book tour

Andy Levy-Aizenkopf
Staff Reporter

A founder of the Free Gaza Movement last week mistakenly revealed herself publicly to be a Holocaust revisionist. Greta Berlin, who co-founded the U.S.-based group in 2006, posted a Sept. 30 Twitter comment to @free-gaza.org, the group's official feed, that read: "Zionists operated the concentration camps and helped murder millions of innocent Jews."

The post also contained a link to a video of a speech by Eustace Mullins, a noted antisemitic conspiracy theorist who died in 2010, claiming that the word Nazi is an amalgam of the words "National socialism" and "Zionist," and that Adolf Hitler and Europe's Zionists conspired together to eradicate non-Zionist Jews.

The post was later deleted, but not before Avi Mayer, a staffer at the Jewish Agency for Israel, grabbed screenshots of it and disseminated it through his own social networking platforms.

Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), called Berlin's comment "one of the most vile expressions of antisemitism that we have seen in recent memory."

"It is also further evidence of the relentlessly toxic and destructive orientation of Israel's detractors," he told The C/JN. "To suggest that Jews were responsible for the Holocaust goes beyond Jew hatred. It speaks to the depths of inhumanity that those spearheading the anti-Israel movement are willing to plummet."

Although she later deleted the post, Berlin apologized for having made it public, stating that the message had been intended only for people on her personal Facebook list.

"Facebook attached the [Facebook twitter] account to my personal account. It should have gone to the [Facebook] account. My apologies," she told the National Post.

"I shared it without watching it. I am sorry that I just sent it forward without looking at it. It won't happen again," read a tweet from the Free Gaza Movement account, posted Oct. 3.

Shortly after Berlin's post, commenters on the Free Gaza Twitter site began accusing Berlin and the whole Free Gaza Movement of being antisemitic.

The movement is the main organizer of the Gaza flotillas that aim to challenge Israel's maritime authority off the coast of the Gaza Strip.

One U.S. blogger also stumbled upon a cached Sept. 21 Free Gaza tweet that linked to Im Wald von Katyn, a 1943 Nazi propaganda film.

In separate Twitter messages, Free Gaza's chair, Huda Arraf, called Berlin's post "offensive" and supported her apology. Shortly thereafter, Arraf alerted followers on her social networking site that she had resigned her position.

In subsequent Twitter exchanges, Mayer asked Arraf whether her resignation had anything to do with the furor over Berlin's comments. He also challenged her to further denounce the content of Berlin's initial post and asked whether the controversial co-founder would remain with the organization.

Arraf's tweeted response to Mayer and his assiduous documenting of the whole affair: "U must have nothing better to do. Pathetic."

Berlin is currently on a Canadian speaking tour to promote her book Freedom Sailors, the chronicle of her group's inaugural 2008 flotilla journey.

Queries by The C/JN to Berlin were not returned by deadline.

She spoke in Montreal and Ottawa last week and is scheduled to speak in Nanaimo, B.C., on Oct. 23 and in Vancouver at Simon Fraser University's Harbourfront Centre on Oct. 24.

Conference on Jewish lit set for U of T

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

A one-day symposium featuring scholars of Jewish literature will offer a new approach to the field – one that has been redefined by today's multicultural and multilingual world.

On Oct. 18, the Centre for Jewish Studies at the University of Toronto will present Jewish Literature Beyond Borders, a conference that will bring together scholars from across North America to present panel discussions on the relationship between African and Yiddish Diasporas, German-Hebrew bilingualism, and a Canadian "Yiddishland" in Montreal.

"The [conference] topic comes out of my own research interests," said Rachel Seelig, the Ray D. Wolfe Postdoctoral Fellow at U of T's Centre for Jewish Studies who organized the symposium.

Rachel Seelig

"I'm especially interested in Jewish authors who don't really adhere to conventional orders of literary history; be they linguistic, national or cultural."

Seelig, who teaches courses at U of T on German-Jewish and Yiddish literature and culture, said that many of the authors she has studied work with multiple languages and lived in a number of countries.

"I got to thinking that since this is such a cross-cultural and interdisciplinary kind of idea, that it would be a great idea to build a conference that would bring together people from different academic departments, different fields and different universities," she said.

"There are a number of interesting younger scholars out there working on this topic, and I was really interested in bringing them together and having the forum to showcase their work and talk to each other."

The biggest draw to the event is Hebrew University of Jerusalem professor emeritus Dan Miron, who will be lecturing in Toronto for the first time.

Miron, a professor at Columbia University, will present the keynote lecture titled "Centres and Peripheries in Current Jewish Literary Studies."

"The main reason I was really excited about inviting Dan Miron... is that he basically offers a new way of looking at Jewish literature as not being one literature, but being multiple literatures that coincide with other national literatures," Seelig said.

"We're really excited to have him. He's never been here before and, in my mind at least, he's the leading scholar today working on Hebrew and Yiddish literature, and multilingual Jewish literary studies."

Seelig added that she's thrilled about each of the nine scholars who agreed to take part in the three panel discussions.

The event, which is free and open to the public, will feature a short lecture by Rebecca Margolis, a Canadian scholar from the University of Ottawa who is considered an expert on Yiddish Montreal.

"She wrote a book that came out last year... about the status of this language that after the war was the most widely spoken minority language in Quebec and was stuck in the middle between English and French," Seelig said.

"It's a really interesting area of study that few people have even looked at."

Seelig will also be presenting a lecture during the second panel discussion of the day about German-Jewish poet Ludwig Strauss.

"He is a really interesting figure because he became a bilingual German-Hebrew poet when he immigrated to Palestine in the '30s. My talk looks at his transition from Germany to Palestine and from German to Hebrew, and looks at the ideological transformation that underlies the linguistic and physical transition."

Seelig said she hopes the symposium, which is designed to be accessible to the non-academic community, will be well attended.

"My idea in organizing this event was to make it have as broad an appeal as possible. I know that people from the broader community are sometimes intimidated by academic events. But all of the people who are presenting have a really accessible, approachable way of teaching."

New theory on cause of Alzheimer's gaining respect

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A Jewish General Hospital (JGH) researcher with a controversial theory on how Alzheimer's disease starts says she is feeling vindicated after the American pharmaceutical giant Merck agreed to work with her lab.

Andréa LeBlanc, senior investigator at the Bloomfield Centre for Research in Aging at the JGH's Lady Davis Institute, told a meeting of the JGH Foundation governors that Merck, as well as a small Quebec biotech firm, will be collaborating in the development of an inhibitor of the enzyme she believes is the cause of Alzheimer's.

During her 19 years of research in this direction, she faced skepticism and outright derision within the scientific community for challenging what has been the accepted explanation for the past 25 years of the cause of Alzheimer's: the formation of "plaques" on the brain that destroy neurons.

"Grant reviewers told me I was wrong. I was stupid, but I am very stubborn and believe in what I am doing," LeBlanc said.

LeBlanc discovered the enzyme Caspase-6, and has gathered evidence that its activation with each other, she said. The more synaptic degeneration, the greater the cognitive impairment, which is not necessarily true of the loss of neurons.

If the origin of the disease at the molecular level is established, then there may be hope of slowing its progression early on, if not preventing it.

LeBlanc stressed that such a treatment is years away. All treatments over the past 10 years have targeted the plaques, she said, with virtually no success, and a number of clinical trials worldwide have been stopped.

These drugs reduced the plaque, but there was no improvement in the patient's functioning or in halting the disease's progress, she said, indicating the plaque is not the cause in the first place.

LeBlanc noted that almost all cases of Alzheimer's disease are what scientists call sporadic. Less than five per cent are inherited through a genetic mutation.

She has been able to induce Caspase-6 activity in the lab using cultured human cells.

She described Caspase-6 as "chewing" on the proteins in cells leaving ragged ends that impair function.

LeBlanc believes the enzyme is present very early, long before a person is aware of, for example, any change in their memory. In fact, there may be quite a lot of the enzymes and yet the person has no apparent symptoms. Caspase-6 is not found in the brains of those with other neurodegenerative diseases such as Huntington's, or in the brains of those under age 45, she said.

Inhibiting Caspase-6 may have risks, she recognizes; the enzyme, for example, is found in the colon, where it may have a role in the turnover of cells in the lining, a factor in the development of cancer.

The JGH Foundation is trying to raise $5 million for a comprehensive Alzheimer's program, incorporating research, the training of professionals, public education and attracting scientists of LeBlanc's calibre.

The Anna & Louis Goldfarb JGH/McGill Memory Clinic, which provides early diagnosis and treatment of memory disorders and dementia, is the largest of its kind in Canada, treating 800 patients per year.

Yet, it cannot keep up with demand. The clinic currently has a 12-month waiting list of 200 people in need of assessment. With the aging of Quebec's population, the JGH is predicting that 160,000 Quebecers will have the disease by 2030, at an annual cost to the health and social service system of $153 million.

Andréa LeBlanc

precedes the plaques, and in later stages, tangles on the brain.

These lesions are actually small deposits of the protein amyloid peptide.

LeBlanc, who is the James McGill Professor in the McGill University department of neurology and neurosurgery, pointed out that the presence of these plaques can only be confirmed upon autopsy, but Caspase-6 can be detected while the person is alive.

What's more, it can be found well before a person shows symptoms of Alzheimer's.

Caspase-6 is at the root of the losses of synapses, the pathways by which neurons communicate

Cantor's family raises $25K for breast cancer research

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Cantor Eric Moses and his family decided to participate in the Sept. 30 CIBC Run for the Cure, presented by the Canadian Breast Cancer Foundation, after his son, Sammy, a student at Associated Hebrew Schools, came home with Project Give Back.

The assignment involved researching a charity and presenting it to the class.

Moses, the cantor at Beth Sholom Synagogue, and his wife, Melissa Lieberman-Moses, a psychologist, thought that they should help make the project relevant to their son and his twin sisters.

"We told them about Melissa's battle with breast cancer, which began when she was pregnant with the twins, nine years earlier. She had five surgeries, followed by chemotherapy," he said.

"It was quite an emotional discussion. We always wondered when we would tell the kids, and this was the perfect opportunity. We had thought we would tell them when they were a little older, but they handled it well."

After learning about his mother's battle with cancer — she has the BRCA 1 gene deficiency — Sammy began to research the Canadian Breast Cancer Foundation, Moses said.

He decided to take part in the run and set a goal of raising $100.

"Before he knew it, he had raised $1,000, and the whole family got on board," the cantor said. "In the end, our small family of five raised $25,184, and we ended up being in the top five teams in terms of fundraising — only to be bested by several corporations. On a personal note, I ended up third overall in personal donations."

Also in the works, Moses said, is a concert in the fall of 2013 or spring 2014 featuring female artists, which will raise money to help test women for the BRCA gene.

"We got an email from a doctor who said they have tested 7,000 women for the gene, but the Canadian Breast Cancer Foundation does not have funds to test every woman. We were inspired to help out," he said.

"Our objective is not only to raise money to enable Jewish women across Ontario to continue to be tested, but to raise awareness about the BRCA gene and its deficiency among Jewish women."

SERVICING THE WORLD
COMES NATURALLY

Divisions among people are never good

Rabbi Avram Rothman

The midrash in the parashah of Bereshit notes that on the second day of Creation, the Torah doesn't use the expression "ki tov" (it was good). In fact, the second day of creation is the only day that doesn't close with the statement that what was created that day was good.

On all the other days, the Torah says that "God saw that it was good."

Why would that day not be considered good?

The midrash explains that on the second day, God created the firmament that divided between the water above and the water below:

This, the midrash explains, was the day God introduced division machloket into the world. "If a machloket that is for the establishment of the world isn't 'good,' certainly a machloket that isn't for such a lofty purpose, but is just to create disunity and arguments, is not good."

A truer statement was never made. Fighting, arguments and divisions between people are not good – not in our eyes and not in God's.

There is an obvious problem with this midrash: this was neither the only nor the first division during Creation. Another division was created a day earlier – on the first day: "And God divided between the light and the dark."

So God created machloket on the first day as well. He separated light and darkness. But despite the division, the Torah says, "And God saw that it was good."

It's necessary to divide between light and dark, as shown on the first day of creation. There we must divide. However, on the second day, the division is quite distinct from

To separate people – different races, genders, cultures – is setting up a division between two like things – human beings.

On the second day, God divided the upper and the lower waters. This was not a case of good water and bad water, or of true water and false water. This was a case of making a division between two equally valid things. Regarding such a division, we don't say, "It was good."

A division was necessary, but there is no "ki tov," because there's no reason to have machloket between water and water.

The midrash teaches that the division created on the second day between two like things is not good. Likewise, when it comes to people, machloket – hatred and fighting – is not good.

Dividing people is never good, not when the world was in its infancy and not today. May we find ways to unite and rid the Jewish People of the divisions, mistrust and hatred that separate us from each other.

Rabbi Avram Rothman is the spiritual leader of the Thornhill Community Shul and Ginzburg Learning Centre in Thornhill, Ont.

Rabbinic Reflections

the division created on the first day. That day, the Almighty draws a firm line between two distinctly different things: good and evil, right and wrong, light and dark.

On the second day, we see a division between two things that are exactly the same – water and water. Here the midrash teaches that to cause a division between two of the same thing is not at all good. To divide between water and water, even if necessary, cannot be considered good.

Why is that?

Paying taxes and moral leadership

No one likes to pay taxes. Yet taxes are the lifeblood of our society, paying for our security, health, public education and thousands of other services that we all benefit from. While we can endlessly argue about what's fair, there's very little room to argue over our legal obligation to pay the taxes established by our elected officials.

Sadly, though not surprisingly, a survey released recently by H&R Block found that 55 per cent of Canadians say that given a choice, they would pay cash to avoid paying sales tax. Interestingly, 84 per cent admitted to paying cash for a product or service to avoid sales tax. To think that only 16 per cent of Canadians aren't breaking the law is frightening. Even worse, only 30 per cent of people actually see anything wrong with this. More disturbing is that while 43 per cent of those over 65 say it's wrong to do so, only 17 per cent of those aged 18 to 34 agree that one should not cheat. The sense of entitlement – of getting something for nothing – is pervasive, but even more pronounced among younger people. Clearly, civics classes are having little effect.

I write these words on the day after Yom Kippur. Many of the sins we begged forgiveness for were those relating to our monetary dealings. While it's most difficult for those of flesh and blood to never give in to their desires, at the very least, one should have the moral character to admit our wrongdoings. That's the first step in the repentance process. If 83 per cent of our youth see nothing wrong with cheating on taxes, we have our work cut out for us.

On a practical level, the government should be conducting many more audits raising the probability, currently very low, of getting caught. While more controversial, offering greater rewards for those who report the evasion of others – as in the U.S. system – might help. I doubt there are many people who wouldn't call the police if their house was robbed. Tax cheats do much the same thing as burglars, albeit in a more "refined manner," as they steal from all of us behind "closed doors." With an underground economy estimated at some $40 billion, something needs to be done. We need look no further than Greece to see the relationship between tax avoidance and economic disaster.

Canada is the economic envy of the world. Our gratitude must begin with thanks to former finance minister Paul Martin for slaying the deficit and for his tremendous foresight in not allowing bank mergers – mergers that would have likely seen the financial meltdown wreak havoc on our banking system, as it did the world over.

Perhaps even more importantly, Canada is a moral leader in the world. The government of Prime Minister Stephen Harper has been unwavering in its support of Israel, of demonstrating to the world that foreign policy must begin with moral leadership. (No, the Conservatives aren't perfect, but who is?)

While I dislike paying taxes as much as the next person, I consider it an honour to fulfil my legal obligation so that Canada can continue to be a model of economic and moral leadership.

We must speak up on behalf of all chained women

In order to deal with a timely issue, this month my column is different from the usual content of "Views and Reviews."

A recent article in New York's Jewish Week tells the story of an unusual document that an American woman, Phyllis Hofmann Waldmann, found in her deceased mother's papers. The document, written in German with the word "Halitzah" at the top, was witnessed and signed on the same day as Ms. Waldmann's parents' ketubah (wedding contract) by the same two male witnesses in Wurzburg, Germany. What is the significance of this document?

According to the Bible (Deuteronomy 25:4-10), if a married man dies childless, and he has a living brother, the man's brother is supposed to marry his widowed sister-in-law. This marriage is called yibbum, or levirate marriage. Levir is the Latin word for brother-in-law. This law was meant to protect the childless widow. The Bible, recognizing that not all men in this situation would be willing to perform the levir's duty and marry their sister-in-law, legislated that a man who refuses to do so should go through a ceremony called halitzah with the widow. Classical rabbinic law stipulates that the widow is in a state of limbo until her brother-in-law decides which of his two available options he will exercise – either yibbum or halitzah – and she's not free to marry another person until she is "freed" by her brother-in-law.

So to avoid the potential problem of leaving a widow in limbo, the Orthodox rabbis of Wurzburg, Germany, had the brothers of apparently any groom sign a document like the one that Ms. Waldmann found. According to the Jewish Week, the document read: "Should halitzah become necessary, we the undersigned obligate ourselves that... immediately and unconditionally and without any reimbursement we will confirm the ordinance of Jewish ritual law and give Mrs. Enny Hofmann, born Hamburger, the halitzah. Our sister-in-law will be entitled to decide together with us the venue and time of such ceremony."

The Jewish Week reports that three Hofmann brothers signed the contract, as well as two witnesses. It was drawn up by Rabbi Shimon Hanover, the regional rabbi of Wurzburg. Happily, Mr. and Mrs. Hofmann had children and so the halitzah agreement was never needed.

Many of us here in Canada took more than an academic interest in the story of this document, since a sorry saga is unfolding, or perhaps not unfolding here in 2012. A religious law passed away and left a childless widow. The brother of the deceased (part of the religious community in a major Canadian city) has refused now for more than a year to perform halitzah for his widowed sister-in-law. Yibbum is out of the question, since the brother himself is already married. He has a financial dispute with the widow and is using the halitzah as leverage to effect a settlement that will be more advantageous to him. Sadly, the widow (also religious) remains "chained" or stranded, unable to remarry.

In many ways, this dispute is an internal Orthodox problem. First of all, if the widow were not strongly committed to Orthodox Judaism, she would just go and remarry without the benefit of Orthodox clergy. But beyond that, the recalcitrant brother-in-law, as an Orthodox Jew, would find it impossible to function were it not for the fact that some Orthodox rabbis (a minority, to be sure) are offering him support. On issues of this nature, we find three types of approaches among contemporary Orthodox rabbis.

Some, such as Rabbi Hanover of Wurzburg in the 1930s, search out proactive solutions to ensure that no woman will find herself stranded in this way. Generally, concerned Orthodox rabbis today do take proactive steps, using pre-nuptial agreements that are meant to prevent the more common problem of the denial of a get (a religious divorce). But the same principle applies to a pre-nuptial designed to avoid denial of halitzah. A second group of Orthodox rabbis avoid the use of pre-nups, for whatever reason, but are scandalized by the actions of men who extort their estranged wives or their widowed sisters-in-law by denying or delaying a get or a halitzah. A few such Canadian rabbis have spoken up on the current problem. But there is also a small group of Orthodox rabbis who see nothing intrinsically wrong with such actions, because, technically, it's not against Halachah to deny a get or halitzah or to make them dependent on certain conditions being met.

Most people recognize the inherent unfairness of such behaviour. Still, it's not easy to point to a specific line in a code of Jewish law that outlaws withholding halitzah for leverage in a financial dispute (just as you can't find a line that suggests that such pressure is permitted). One might try pointing to the dozens of verses in the Torah and the prophets exhorting us to beware of mistreating a widow. As Rabbi Moses ben Nahman (Ramban) wrote in his Torah commentary, when the Torah commands that we avoid mistreating a widow, this mitzvah applies to every widow, rich or poor, as widows are psychologically downtrodden and are always "close to crying." While I find such arguments compelling, apparently not all rabbis do.

Yet I think that something effective can be done by our community. Not every decision of an Orthodox rabbi is based solely on what the classical rabbinic texts say. For example, these texts make it perfectly clear that a parent's obligation to feed, clothe and support a child does not last through the teenage years. In other words, according to the letter of rabbinic law, parents may cut off support to their 14-year-old son and tell him to leave home and go join the workforce. But I am certain that if any Orthodox Jews in Canada were to do that, their rabbis would not support them. And why not? Because community standards demand that parents support their children beyond the age of 14.

So there is something we can do. If our community speaks out and makes it perfectly clear that we do not tolerate applying pressure by withholding get or halitzah, no rabbi will dare support such extortion. Let's all make that point, as clearly and loudly as we can.

Ladany critical of IOC

At around 5:30, a roommate jostled him. The first words he heard were, "Arabs have killed Muni." At first I thought he was joking. He was my roommate at the Mexico Olympic Games [in 1968] and was a joker," Ladany said.

"I opened my eyes and saw my roommate dressing. I got into my track shoes and without realizing how serious it was, I walked to the door."

He peaked into the corridor where he saw "a man with dark skin and hat" talking to four security guards. One of the guards, a woman, "asked the dark-skinned man to allow the Red Cross to enter to provide first aid. He refused."

Ladany, still unseen, quietly closed the door and went to the second floor of the apartment where the other athletes were already dressed. He asked what had happened and one of the athletes — a shooter — pointed out the window to the apartment next door where Ladany could see a dark stain on the floor. "This is from the body of Muni," he was told.

"The Arabs may try to catch us also, let's get out," one of the Israelis said.

The group descended to the ground floor, where a glass patio door opened to the outside. The first one out, Zelig Storch, one of the marksmen, ran out in a zigzag pattern away from the building.

As Ladany slipped on a warm-up suit with "Israel" emblazoned on the back, he wondered why Storch was taking those precautions. He quickly realized the terrorists had a clear view of anyone leaving the building and could shoot them down.

The others followed Storch the same way, but when it was Ladany's turn, he walked along the outside of the building to a nearby apartment occupied by the Israeli chef de mission.

The chef was on the phone, warning other Israelis about the danger and calling members of the International Olympic Committee (IOC).

Soon, they, too, left the building, "with brisk steps, not running, not zigzagging" until they reached police lines.

After the Israelis were debriefed, Ladany was free to move around the Olympic village, and he did so, with his Israeli jacket still over top his pajamas.

"I never thought it dangerous to walk with an Israeli team suit," Ladany said. "I'm not a coward, and I walked freely and didn't think there was any danger."

As police negotiated with the terrorists, Ladany and the remaining athletes were kept in the dark. He felt the hostages would be rescued.

In the end, German rescue efforts at a nearby military airport failed miserably. All the Israelis were killed, along with five of the eight hostage-takers.

Ladany heard the news "in two stages." Around midnight, German radio reported the hostages had been freed safely. "We were extremely happy and we all went to sleep," he recalled.

Around four or five in the morning, he was awoken with the news of what really happened. "It was an awful feeling," he said, but probably worse for his wife, who believed her husband was dead.

Ladany, the lone track and field athlete on the team, did not have close personal ties to the other athletes. He had only known them a short time, meeting them shortly prior to departing for Germany.

He had exchanged words with David Berger, a weightlifter who, like himself, held a PhD from Columbia University in New York. "We had some conversations about our common experiences," he recalled.

Because the others were unknown to him, "I came out of the massacre without any mental problems." Others experienced nightmares for years afterward.

Ladany also credits his mental toughness to the life-and-death experiences he had suffered at earlier times. As a five-year-old, he endured Luftwaffe bombings of his native Belgrade. At eight, he was a refugee in the Budapest ghetto, and a few months later, he was a prisoner in the Bergen-Belsen concentration camp in Germany.

Much has been written about the Munich massacre and it recently received the Hollywood treatment in the film Munich, which deals with Israeli efforts to track down and kill the perpetrators. Ladany has unkind words for the film's premise. "Munich was very bad, not artistically, but because it equated two things: the action of the Arab terrorists to kill innocent people with the action of the [Israeli] Mossad where they planned to punish those who planned and executed that action... This equation is not acceptable. These were different kinds of action."

He supported the Mossad's retribution and was pleased to read one of the killers, living the high life in Lebanon, had "joined the other five members of the team to smell flowers from beneath."

Ladany, who still walks his age in kilometres on his birthday, is critical of the IOC for refusing to hold a minute's silence for the slain Israelis, but he also disapproves of the way proponents have pushed the issue.

They'd have more success if they phrased it differently and played down the Israeli aspect, he said. Perhaps a reference to Olympic athletes, only parenthetically mentioning they were from Israel, would work. The way it's put now "is like a red flag for a bull at a bullfight," he said, drawing the ire of Muslim countries and other anti-Israel nations.

Over time, overt references to Israeli athletes could be included, he suggested.

So what was it like, returning to Germany and then having a front row seat to the massacre? "That's a long story. In my book, King of the Road, you can find it," he said.

But after his experiences during the Holocaust and after serving in the Israeli army in the Six Day War and then the Yom Kippur War, "I have seen things in life and experienced many things that most people don't experience even once," he added.
